ANSWER WILSON'S APPEAL.

Peace Society Finds Wide Response from the German People.

The New York Peace Society, of which Andrew Carnegie is President, issued yesterday the first of a series of pamphlets upon international topics brought forward by the war, entitled, "German Democracy," in which it finds a wide response to President Wilson's appeal to the German people. The paper quotes that part of President Wilson's reply to the Pope which said that this Government could not take the word of the present rulers of the German people for any settlement of the war, but only a guarantee backed up by the people of Germany themselves.

"These words," says the Peace Society, "are an appeal to those elements among the German people that keep alive the spirit of the unsuccessful revolution of 1848. A response to this appeal is coming from the Social Democrats who follow the lead of the imprisoned Karl Liebknecht, of Dr. Franz Mehring, of Hugo Haase, and of George Ledebour, who has already declared in the Reichstag 'We want a Republic.' The response has already come from the sailors who have expressed discontent with their rulers, in violent outbreaks at Wilhelmshafen and Pola. It is not for naught that the German Minister of Marine tried to connect the former uprising with the Independent Socialist leaders.

"The response has come, too, from German prisoners in France, presumably of Social Democrat affiliations, who have formed an organization to prepare democratic appeals which, by French aid, will be circulated in the German armies. The response has come from a group of German Radical Democrats, led by Herman Fernau and Dr. Herman Koesmier, exiles at Berne, who have published there since last April a bi-weekly journal, Die Freie Zeitung, devoted to the cause of German liberty. Finally, a response is coming from German-Americans, among whom are many descendants of the men of '48 and who have not forgotten the ideals of Schurz, Blum, Gagern, Kudlich, Hecker, Struve, and Sigel. Such men have formed an organization called 'Friends of German Democracy,' with members in different parts of the nation and societies in New York, Chicago, and St. Louis. The activities of this society are known and approved by the authorities at Washington."

The Peace Society suggests the following books to be read on the subject: "Germany, the Next Republic," Ackerman; "The Coming Democracy," Fernau; "My Four Years in Germany," Gerard, and "Militarism," Liebknecht.

STARTS NOVEL WAR RELIEF.

Kenosha, Wis., Centralizes Its Work in "Patriots' Fund."

KENOSHA, Wis., Nov. 17.—A novel plan to "put all Kenosha behind the war and not a few Kenoshans" is in operation today in this city. The plan provides for centralizing all war relief work to prevent waste in separate money-raising campaigns, and the fund, to be known as "The Patriots' Fund," will meet all legitimate requests for contributions.

Every person who joins the movement pledges himself to contribute one-half hour a week for the support of the various movements to take care of the soldiers in the field and in the cantonments. This half hour is to be contributed in cash to the one central fund, which is to be administered under the authority of the County Council of Defense. Wage earners subscribing to the plan authorize their employers to deduct the equivalent of one-half hour a week, and others who may not be reached in this way pledge to contribute an equivalent percentage of their income as a gift to the fund.

Bond issues by the Government are excepted from the operations of the plan.

LAMBERT BROTHERS

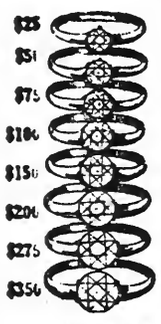
Would Be Appreciated and Would Be Highly Beneficial to You

PLEASE be perfectly at home in this store, which exists for the benefit and pleasure of its customers and could not, of course, exist without them. Do not hesitate to ask questions. We shall gladly answer them. That is one of the things we are here for. Prices are marked in plain figures.

And won't you come soon for your Christmas diamonds, jewelry, rings, and watches? Do not wait for the season of storms, of delays in getting about, of store attendants almost overwhelmed with the holiday rush. Our own factory, in the same building with our store, has sent down important and attractive additions to the Christmas stocks of platinum and solid gold jewelry and rings. Many especially beautiful pieces set with fine diamonds. Artistic mountings of platinum and solid gold are made in the Lambert factory, just above the store.

Christmas jewelry selected at Lamberts at ease and in comfort, long before the Christmas rush, need not be paid for on the spot. Pick out what you want, give your orders for engraving, let us keep your purchases stored in a stout steel vault. Pay when you call for them, at your convenience.

Diamonds At Direct Importers' Prices



Do not hesitate to ask for Diamonds at Lamberts, even if the diamond mines have been closed more than three years. Lamberts bought largely before the cutters' prices went ballooning. As usual, we paid spot-cash and imported the Diamonds direct. None of your diamond money goes into a middleman's pocket when you buy as low as $10.00, $15.00, $20.00, and so on up to $1,500. Even the least expensive diamonds here are cut gems and not chips. All prices in figures plain as the sign on our store. They would be much higher prices if we had left off buying until lately. Because our rent is low, our prices are low.

Solitaire Diamond Engagement Rings

Popular engine turned pattern, heavy solid 14-karat gold case, containing a 17-jewel Waltham movement, $60.00.
Other men's watches, solid 14-karat gold cases, from $31.00 up; gold filled cases $12.75 up. Sterling silver cases, $11.00 up.

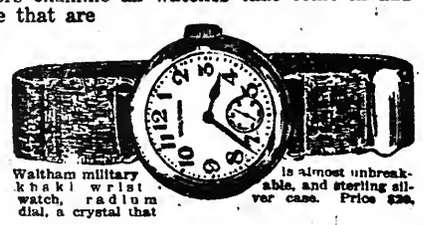
Interesting examples of Lambert Fancy Diamond Rings are here at $300.00, $500.00, $650.00, and hundreds of other prices. Mountings of platinum from the Lambert factory.

Please make a note of this: We will remodel old jewelry, from your designs or our own, or we will remount in the Lambert factory family diamonds at reasonable charges.

Tried and Tested Watches

Watches that won the prize of public confidence long ago, because they are as good timekeepers as the highest skill can produce with the best materials. Walthams, Howards, and other topliners. But even the best workmen in the best factories turn out defective work now and then. To guard our customers from imperfect watches, our own watchmakers examine all watches that come in and throw out those that are unfit for the most exacting service.

Speak to us of military watches, and let us know what you want in that line to send to the boys at the camps. We have more styles than we could illustrate in a dozen advertisements like this, even if we talked of nothing else.



Waltham military khaki wrist watch, radium dial, a crystal that is almost unbreakable, and sterling silver case. Price $20.

A very modern and exquisite Lavalliere, hand-wrought, of solid platinum set with 27 carefully selected diamonds, $240.00. Price includes chain.

Make It a Christmas Lavalliere.

A solid gold Lavalliere that would reflect credit on any Christmas giver's taste may be bought at Lamberts for $2.75. Others with diamond, $9.00 up. Novel patterns in platinum, beautiful, with diamonds of our own direct importation, $30.00 up.

Our Brilliant Brooches.

Just mention brooches and our salesman will show you so many charming designs, all solid gold, that your choice of a Christmas gift will be one of the easiest and most agreeable duties you ever undertook. Simple solid gold brooches, $2.00 up; with guttering diamond $7.50 up.

Barpins, Plain and Fancy.

Barpins, dainty as lace to the eye, but built to last. An amazing range of patterns to choose from, and every one you pick up seems rather more beautiful than the last one you looked at. Guaranteed solid gold, $2.75 up. Solid gold barpins set with diamond, $10.75 up.

Rings for Soldiers and Sailors.

We suggest solid gold military rings as Christmas gifts for the men in service. Upon these rings appear the emblems of cavalry, artillery, fantry, and of the brave bluejackets and marines on the deep water. Solid gold $9.50 up. Sterling Silver $5.00 up. Monograms, which we engrave without charge, give an intimate personal character to gifts like these rings.

Not Forgetting the Youngsters.

We have something in Christmas jewelry for everybody, not overlooking the children, whose delight in their first rings every lover of children knows. Well-made solid gold signets for boys and girls, $2.50 up; solid gold rings for small children as low as $1.00.

Solid gold fancy stone rings for ladies, with garnets, amethysts, topazes, bloodstones, and other gems, $3.00 up.

Give Him Another Pair.

Maybe the man you have in mind for a Christmas gift has a pair of gold cuff buttons. That is no reason why he should not have another pair by way of variety. Guaranteed solid gold, $2.00 a pair up. With diamond, $11.00 a pair up.

18-karat $4.00 up

BOTH SIDES FAVORED BY HARBOR AWARD

Settles Question of Hours and Wages for 7,000 Marine Workers.

DECISION SURE TO STAND

Employers and Employes Urged to Reduce Overtime to a Minimum —Fair, Says Captain Baker.

After hearings and conferences lasting two weeks the Arbitration Board appointed by the Federal Government to settle the question of wages and working hours between the 7,000 affiliated marine workers and the tugboat owners in New York Harbor announced its award yesterday at noon in the Custom House.

In regard to working conditions for employes on harbor craft, other than ferryboats, lighters, and tidewater boats, the award states that where food is not provided the owner shall allow sixty cents a day, or $18 a month, to each member of the crew, the length of the day to be governed by the Federal law and one day off each week on full pay for every employe. One full week's vacation, with pay, is granted to every man who has been in the employ of one company for twelve months or more. Carfare is given crews when boats have to be taken over other than the designated point.

Employers and employes are urged to reduce overtime to a minimum, but when overtime is required it shall be paid for at time and a half.

Captains are to be paid from $125 a month to $145 a month, with board, according to the engine power of the boat they command. Mates and pilots required to navigate are to receive $125 a month and board. Deckmates on passenger and excursion vessels get $90 a month, with food. First deck hands, $65 a month, and second deck hands, $60 a month, with board.

The engineers are to be divided into three classes at $115, $125, and $135 a month, with board. Others receive $60; firemen, $50 to $55, and floatmen, $60. All of these are to receive board with wages.

Although neither side has received all that was asked for in their respective claims, Captain William B. Baker, U. S. A., the Chairman of the Arbitration Board, said yesterday that the board had tried to do its best and act fairly to both the marine workers and the owners. Some of the members of the Towboat Exchange appeared to think that the men had received too much in the award and the union officials, on the other hand, believed that enough had not been given them, especially the marine engineers, who asserted that a tugboat engineer was entitled to the same pay as the Captain.

PRESIDENT SAVES CADET.

Refuses to Dismiss John Thomas Bell, Court-Martialed at West Point.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17. — President Wilson has declined to carry out a sentence of dismissal imposed by a court-martial at West Point on Cadet John Thomas Bell, a first classman at the Military Academy. But for the charges brought against him, Cadet Bell would have been commissioned as a Second Lieutenant at the time of the graduation of his class.

The President, while confirming the sentence, commuted it to withholding the commission until the date of the President's action on the case. This makes Bell junior to all the other members of his class.

Bell was accused of having left guard duty before being relieved, and of having denied it to a superior officer. He was convicted on both charges.

FORD FOR UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

Manufacturer Also Says War Will Be Won by Nation That Understands Use of Machinery.

Henry Ford, who has just been appointed to the staff of the Shipping Board in Washington, and whose hobby is the standardization of material for mechanical production, said yesterday in a statement given out here:

"We must think more about machinery. If this war is to be won, it will be won by the nation that knows best how to use tools and machinery; that knows the secret of quantity production through standardization on one model. I have been disappointed to find our Government planning different sizes and kinds of equipment and machinery where one model could be used. Ships can be built faster, better, and cheaper if standardized to a single model. One model makes possible production in enormous quantities, reduces cost, and improves quality. In this standardization lies the secret of American industrial power, and we need our industrial power in this war.

"From the distance I thought the best work in Washington would be done by civilian aids. On my recent visit there I have seen something of the army officers. They have a discipline and training that is needed by the country at large. Their influence should spread."

Mr. Ford also came out strongly in favor of universal military training.

"Our Government must never abandon the barracks and army camps that are being built," he said. "When peace comes the world will be ready for disarmament. The people will understand the wrong of killing each other. The German will see that the American and the Frenchman he went out to kill are just as good as he is, and the American will feel the same way about the German. Then we must develop a great national army for training all our young men between the ages of 18 and 21. We can bring them together from farms and cities in the wintertime to the barracks and training places.

"Young Americans need discipline. In this service army the Government can teach them order and train them to work. They should have a few hours of gymnastics and drill, and five or six hours of work in a factory every day. Near each encampment there can be located a few factories for tractors and other implements that farmers need. Our branch assembly plants for motor cars have proved to us that the whole of a factory does not have to be congested in one place. One mother plant can send the patterns, raw castings, and forgings to dozens of branch plants, each employing 2,000 or 3,000 men. Designing and management will centre at the mother plant, so that supervision of these branch plants will be simple.

"A part of this national training army of young men can be moved to places where big work for the nation is under way. They can build dams, straighten rivers, develop irrigation work, and aid in constructing good roads that will bring our people closer together. In this way the workmen would be kept near to the land.

"The United States must save its labor power. Transportation for armies and supplies is a basic need of wartime. Railroads alone cannot handle the freight. The Germans are reported to have moved recently an army of 900,000 men from the eastern to the western front by auto trucks. The Ford plant can produce 2,000 one-ton trucks daily, and its production can be increased in a few weeks to 3,000. Each truck can haul eight soldiers with full equipment. During the first month our shop could furnish trucks to haul an army of 480,000 men, thereafter for 720,000 men in each month. Each workman can manufacture a truck in fifteen days.

"We are ready to furnish the Government these trucks at shop cost without profit. I will take no profit from anything produced for any Government during the war. I despise the profiteer who makes money out of war."

Architect's Attack Upon the President, Judge Declares, Was Not Shared in by His Wife.

The two-year-old case of the Government against Mrs. Charlotte A. Warren, who was accused of having undervalued wearing apparel which she brought from France in November, 1915, ended yesterday when Judge Manton of the Federal District Court fined her $8,000 on her plea of guilty. Before the sentence was pronounced the Court read a lecture to the defendant that was composed equally of eulogy and censure. In the course of it he referred to the criticisms that the defendant's husband, Whitney Warren, an architect, had directed at the President and his advisers, and said he was glad to know that the defendant had not shared her husband's views in this respect.

Mrs. Warren appeared in court at 9:30 A. M. and seated herself near the bench in a manner wholly cool and collected. She was accompanied by her counsel, William L. Wemple, and John W. H. Crim. After a brief plea for clemency by Mr. Crim, Judge Manton said:

"Well, Mrs. Warren, there isn't anything that I can say to add to your position, just now, of humiliation. What I do say is simply said because I feel what sentence I am going to impose requires explanation. Yesterday there stood at the bar of justice in this court two men who were charged with smuggling. I sentenced them to prison for good terms. I did that because I felt the crime of smuggling must be stamped out, and the only way to stamp it out, apparently, is to impose prison sentences. I think that your offense, as I have examined it, and as it is conceded by your confession of guilt, is tantamount to smuggling.

"Except for some extenuating circumstances that have been submitted to me, I think the sentence in your case should be the same. This much has come to my attention. I do not wish to say it publicly, but your physicians have called on me and explained your condition of health, that together with your mature years and the work you have done for mankind, are things which weigh in your favor. True religion is taking care of and assisting the orphans and comforting the widows, and that has constituted some of your mission in life."

The Judge said that he had been told that Mrs. Warren had done much good work in France, that he himself had seen the need and had practiced the work of relieving the poor and heavily laden, and that the good work she had done for others would count in her favor.

"I think your work in France stands much more in your favor now," the Judge continued, "because your husband, while you were in such splendid service, was criticising unfairly and unjustly the greatest humanitarian known to mankind, President Wilson. I understand you did not share that criticism and, therefore, standing out against his action is your action for the good of the widows and orphans in France. In view of this work and in view of what your doctors have told me, I feel it would be wrong to impose a prison sentence upon you. However, the case is a flagrant one and you must receive the other alternative. The statute provides for a fine of $5,000 or two years' imprisonment or both. I shall sentence you to pay a fine of $5,000 on the first count and $1,000 on each of the other counts."

Mrs. Warren and her counsel paid the fine to the clerk and left the court hurriedly in fruitless efforts to escape a host of photographers. Mrs. Warren declared the value of the goods she brought here two years ago to be only $1,000, and afterwards settled the civil suit of the Government by paying a share of $7,836.07, which the Government appraisers said were the value of the goods abroad, and in addition $3,972.27, the amount of the duty. The Government in the civil suit named Mrs. Warren, and her traveling companions, Miss Evelyn Burden, sister of I. Townsend Burden, and Miss Burden's sister, Mrs. Gwendolyn Dows, as defendants. The total amount was divided between them and paid last month.

Mrs. Warren at first pleaded not guilty to the criminal charge against her, but her settlement of the civil action was equivalent to a plea of guilty, which she afterward substituted for her first plea. When Miss Burden on a plea of guilty on charges similar to that against Mrs. Warren, was fined $2,500, Judge Manton told her then that if she had gone to trial and had insisted on her innocence he would have been obliged to send her to prison. Mrs. Dows was never implicated in the criminal proceedings.

AUTO BANDITS SCARED OFF.

Fail in Attempt to Hold Up Paymaster with $15,000.

Four roughly dressed men in an automobile yesterday made an unsuccessful attempt to hold up John H. Bruning, paymaster of the Fagan Iron Works, at Fourteenth and Cole Streets, Jersey City. Bruning, who had $15,000 for the payroll, was in another automobile with Joseph Schmidt and August F. Brewer. When they were half a block from the works the bandits' car drew alongside revolvers were pointed at Bruning and his fellow passengers and Schmidt, who was driving, was ordered to stop.

He kept on, however, and several shots were fired, one of which went through Bruning's hat. Then some boys ran up shouting and the bandits fled. The boys said they were in a Ford, bearing a license plate "6719 N. J. 1917." The police traced the car to Hudson Boulevard, but there it disappeared. The Hoboken police sent out an alarm, stating that the car had been stolen in the city.

RESERVE OFFICERS MAY GO TO GUARD

Baker Tells Camp Wadsworth's Commander of Policy of Recommissioning.

NIGHT WORK IN TRENCHES

Service Under War Conditions Will Begin Tomorrow—Epidemic Reports Are Denied.

SPARTANBURG, S. C., Nov. 17.—Secretary of War Baker today notified Brig. Gen. Charles L. Phillips, commanding the 27th Division at Camp Wadsworth, that it was the policy of the War Department to recommission some members of the Officers' Reserve Corps in the National Guard. The Secretary's message, sent through Adjt. Gen. William Kelly, Jr., follows:

"In the reorganization of the National Guard divisions it is the policy of the War Department to recommission such officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps and of the national army as shall be recommended for permanent assignments in the National Guard. It should be plainly understood that these officers will receive new commissions in the National Guard of the United States. Their acceptance of the new commissions will automatically vacate their commissions in the Officers' Reserve Corps or the national army.

The posting of the order caused great joy to the reserve officers, of whom there are about 200 at the camp, but it aroused considerable speculation among the non-commissioned men of the Guard regiments. A list of top sergeants and especially well qualified sergeants was compiled more than a month ago and submitted to divisional headquarters with the explanation that the men were to be commissioned as second lieutenants. As there are not many vacancies in the division the "non-coms," after reading today's order, were disposed to think they had been slighted in favor of the reserve officers.

To Enter the Trenches.

Lieut. Col. Franklin W. Ward, acting chief of staff, said that the Second Batalion of the 105th Infantry and the regimental headquarters machine gun company would be the first units to take up night work in the trenches. The soldiers will enter the trenches at 9 o'clock Monday night for a twelve-hour tour of duty, during which they will serve under conditions like those on the war front—eating, sleeping, and bringing up reliefs in the trenches and doing patrol duty in "No Man's Land."

Stirred by the arrival of telegrams and letters from widely separated parts of New York State, which inquired in frantic terms about the scope of epidemics said to be ravaging this camp, Lieut. Col. Walter C. Montgomery, Sanitary Officer, tonight issued a statement branding the unfounded reports as the work of German agents.

"Our weekly health report, compiled today and wired to the War Department, shows a sick rate of nineteen per thousand," said Colonel Montgomery, "and this includes everything—accidental injuries and minor ailments—for which a soldier is carried on his company sick report.

"We have three cases of pneumonia in camp. There is no diphtheria, no typhoid, no para-typhoid, no measles, no dysentery, no scarlet fever and none of the diseases which are commonly dreaded. Early in the week we had one case which we suspected might be cerebro-spinal meningitis, but that case is convalescent and there have been no other cases of that nature.

To Handle Holiday Mail.

Lieutenant Hugh Weeks, U. S. A., has been appointed to handle the great quantity of holiday mail and packages which is expected. Enlisted men have been assigned to assist him. Lieutenant Weeks said that many letters sent to soldiers were being improperly addressed. He suggested this form:

PRIVATE JOHN DOE,

With the Knights of Columbus looking after the moral welfare of the 6,000 knights and 18,000 Catholics in the division, and the Y. M. C. A. ministering to the followers of various other creeds, the Jewish Board for Welfare Work today sent a representative to camp. The board's Commissioner, Isidore Dominitz, said that he intended to arrange so that the Jewish soldiers, of whom there are many, could observe their faith.

FORM NEW 69TH REGIMENT.

State Body to Replace Famous Command Now in U. S. Service.

A new Sixty-ninth Regiment is to be organized to take the place of the "Fighting Sixty-ninth," now in the Federal service. Lieut. Col. Phelan announced yesterday that he had received authority to expand the Depot Battalion into a regiment of twelve companies, and that he would begin the work of organization immediately. The duties of the new regiment will become those of an active military organization for State service only.

Enlistments will be made for two years, unless sooner discharged. Full equipment will be furnished by the State and drills will be held weekly. Already a company has been formed of employes of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, and several of the Home Defense units drilling in the armory signified their intention of joining.

NO MONEY SPENT BY HYLAN.

Campaign Statement Shows He Received and Expended Nothing.

The campaign expense statement of Judge John F. Hylan, Mayor-elect, made public by the Bureau of Elections yesterday, said that he received nothing and expended nothing. It was stated that the account had been filed within the legal time limit, which expired at midnight Friday. Attached to Judge Hylan's report was the following:

"All contributions on behalf of my candidacy were turned over to the Business Men's League Campaign Committee with instructions to account for them in connection with all other contributions received and expended by them."

Mayor-elect Hylan, accompanied by Mrs. Hylan and daughter, went to Atlantic City yesterday to spend Sunday. In an interview wired from Atlantic City and published in a Brooklyn newspaper yesterday afternoon, the Mayor-elect was quoted as promising Brooklyn complete autonomy in borough affairs and stating that he was confident that the "problems of New York City" would be solved by the incoming administration.

"Should we not succeed in solving them all," Judge Hylan was quoted as saying, "I do not feel that this will be charged up against me when the time comes for me to go again before the people of New York for their support at the polls."

SWANN TO EXAMINE ARMY BAZAAR FUNDS

He Sends for Witnesses to Explain About the Comfort Kit Charity.

RECEIPTS ALMOST VANISH

Instead of Supplying 70,000 Men at the Front, Only 700 Can Now Be Taken Care Of.

District Attorney Swann announced yesterday that he was arranging to make an inquiry into the affairs of the Army and Navy Bazaar, which took place in the Grand Central Palace beginning on Oct. 27. Out of estimated gross receipts of $71,475.93, it is said, only $754.96 will be available for comfort kits for enlisted men. Mr. Swann said he had requested several persons to call at his office tomorrow to be questioned concerning the management of the charity. Pending an official report from a firm of public accountants it has been asserted that the expenses of the charity were out of proportion to the net proceeds.

"This office has some records about certain men connected with this affair," said Mr. Swann. "These records are locked in the safe of the clerk of General Sessions and cannot be reached today—a half holiday."

Mr. Swann would not say as to whom these records referred. Frederick J. Remsen was arrested some days ago on a charge of forgery and perjury in connection with the cashing of a $500 check that had been donated to the bazaar. H. S. Rubens, President of the Industrial Alcohol Company, 27 William Street, drew the check to the order of Edward S. Moore, Treasurer of the bazaar. It is charged that Remsen was not authorized to solicit donations and that he caused a Broad Street café proprietor to cash the check by introducing to him a man impersonating Mr. Moore. The bank made good the check and Mr. Rubens gave the amount to the bazaar.

Well-known men who acted as heads of the committees of the bazaar were Mayor Mitchel, Honorary Chairman; Supreme Court Justice John Ford, Chairman of the General Committee, and Victor L. Zorn, Chairman of the Executive Committee. Mr. Zorn said the accounts of the bazaar were being audited by the Federal Auditing Company.

"We expect that the audited statement will be ready on Thursday," said Mr. Zorn, "and we have called a meeting of the committees for that day at the Machinery Club. Until we get this statement we have no means of knowing the exact situation, but it does appear to me that the figures which have been published do not correctly state the facts.

"The members of the committee were surprised and disappointed at the small returns from the bazaar. It was my first experience in a matter of this kind, and I realize now more than ever that these charitable affairs do not return anything like a proportionate share of profit to expenses or in accordance with the amount of work expended upon them."

The bazaar had been planned to supply tobacco, gamee, and other things for 70,000 men. Instead, not more than 700 can be given kits. A detailed statement of the expenditures of the bazaar shows that the chief source of income was the advertising in the souvenir program. The management obtained $45,184.90 in this way, but had to pay one-half the gross receipts for advertising to an advertising agent, as well as the cost of printing the program.

John J. Riordan, Secretary for the committee, speaking yesterday for Edward S. Moore, Treasurer of the organization, and an officer of the Guaranty Trust Company, said the small amount available for the object for which the bazaar was held could be accounted for by a combination of circumstances. One was that the bazaar took place during the intensive period of the drive for the second Liberty Loan, while bad weather and poor attendance made it impossible to attain the margin over expenses which had been hoped for. Under more favorable circumstances it was believed $100,000 would have been taken in.

According to the statement of expenses the $754.96 available for buying kits represented one-half the net earnings of the bazaar. The other half belonged to Waldemar H. P. N. De Bille, the Managing Director, under an arrangement by which he was to receive one-half of the net receipts up to $7,500. Mr. De Bille, who managed the Actors' Fund fair last May, which netted $116,000, said yesterday that he had not received his compensation as manager of the bazaar, and did not know whether he would.

HOMING PIGEONS FOR FRENCH SERVICE

Major Griffin of Signal Corps Recruiting Fliers for Army in France.

Major Frank J. Griffin, Signal Officer, on recruiting service, spoke last evening before the Concourse Association at a meeting in the Belnord, Eighty-seventh Street and Broadway. The Major is head of the new homing pigeon branch of the Signal Service, and is charged with recruiting the army of homing pigeons that are to maintain communication between the first line trenches of the American army in France and the divisional headquarters. The pigeon fanciers who met Major Griffin last night pledged their co-operation, and will begin breeding pigeons at once to be ready for delivery in January.

When barrage fire has broken up the established lines of communication with the rear the soldiers in the front trenches must rely altogether on the pigeons to carry their messages. England has 20,000 of these birds in service, and France has the same number. Already the American troops in France have established lofts and have a few thousand birds in training. Many more of the carriers will be needed, and it is said that at least 5,000 of these birds will be ready for transportation to France in January.

The Government is paying $4 a pair, which is below the market price for the class of flyers wanted, but the breeders are not considering the price. This is shown by the fact that the first birds given by fanciers here were practically a gift.

BARNARD BUILDING OPENED.

Students' Hall, Gift of Jacob H. Schiff, Now in Service.

The doors of Students' Hall, the new building presented to Barnard College by Jacob H. Schiff, were thrown open last week to the undergraduates. The new hall has been badly needed for several years, to relieve the crowding in the old building. It contains class studies, a complete gymnasium and swimming pool, with facilities for a much extended physical education department, rest rooms, and a college parlor, as well as a big modern luncheroom.

So far, only the studies and lunchroom are ready for use, but it is stated that before long the building will be entirely fitted up, ready to serve the purpose expressed by Mr. Schiff at the cornerstone-laying, of promoting the physical and social well-being of the women of Columbia.

PRINT PAPER TRIALS GO ON.

Attorney General Denies Report That Indictments Will Be Dismissed

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—Published reports that indictments against news print manufacturers now on trial in New York for alleged violations of the anti-trust laws would be dismissed were denied today by Attorney General Gregory in a formal statement.

The reports probably grew out of the postponement of the trial until Nov. 26. There were intimations today in other Government quarters that before the trial is resumed negotiations for a reduction in the price of print paper would be opened.

Y. M. C. A. FUND LACKS $8,000,000 OF TOTAL

Clergymen Appealed To to Arouse Interest in Completing $35,000,000 Tomorrow.

MOTT WANTS $50,000,000

Secretary of War Work Council Says Increased Demands Call for Additional Gifts.

Ministers in many churches of the city will make a special effort in their sermons today to arouse the interest of their congregations in the endeavor of the Young Men's Christian Association to raise $35,000,000 for war work in Europe. The campaign will end tomorrow at midnight and the returns up to date are still about $6,000,000 short of the desired amount. Figures from the various parts of the country, as compiled at the campaign headquarters at 124 East Twenty-eighth Street last night, showed a grand total of $29,151,649. The officials in charge of the drive felt certain that the remainder of the money would be raised before tomorrow midnight.

Notwithstanding the fact that 300,000 workers are gathering contributions, letters and telegrams to national headquarters indicate that there are thousands of individuals who are eager to contribute, but who are not being reached by the solicitors. This situation was discussed at a conference called by George W. Perkins last night. In view of the fact that there was not enough time left in which to direct the workers to all quarters from which offers of help have been received, Dr. John R. Mott, General Secretary of the National War Work Council, issued a statement yesterday urging all persons who had not been approached to send their contributions to Cleveland H. Dodge, National Treasurer, at 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City, or to the Treasurer of the local or State Campaign Committee.

"It would be nothing short of a national and international calamity for this fund to fail," Dr. Mott said. "We must more. There are reasons why it is of supreme importance to our country and to the lands which make common cause with us that a sum more nearly $50,000,000 than $35,000,00 should be provided. The developments on the eastern and southern fronts emphasize the absolute necessity of our doing much more for the allied armies in those sections than was contemplated when the $35,000,000 budget was framed.

"Moreover, the recent request of the Premier of France that the Y. M. C. A. establish and operate 1,500 soldiers' homes, covering the entire French Army of 4,000,000 men, is one that cannot be denied, and that in itself calls for at least $3,000,000 more than our budget had assigned to the French Army. The development of the plans of our Government and the inevitable increase of our own forces make it increasingly clear that we need to be put in a position to do everything that our own men need to promote their comfort and efficiency."

Among the contributions made in New York City yesterday were the following:

E. S. Harkness	$100,000
American Telephone Co.	100,000
American Express Co.	10,000
Leering, Milliken & Co.	10,000
J. & W. Seligman & Co.	10,000
F. W. Woolworth & Co.	25,000

The New York Women's Committee working on the Y. M. C. A. war fund reported contributions yesterday aggregating $128,000. This sum included the following gifts:

Mrs. S. V. Harkness	$100,000
Mrs. F. G. Griswold	5,000
Mrs. J. H. Williams	5,000
Mrs. Rufus Patterson	3,000
Mrs. T. R. Dwight	2,800
Mrs. Elliott F. Shepard	2,500
Mrs. John S. Kennedy	2,500
Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin	2,500
Mrs. John S. Rogers	1,000
Mrs. Douglas Elliman	1,000
Mrs. Goodhue Livingston	1,000
Mrs. Mary Hoffman	1,000
Mrs. Douglas Robinson	1,000

Among the gifts reported by wire from other parts of the country yesterday was one of $5,000 from the Christian Science Church in Boston. Both the employers and employes in the steel industry made donations to the fund yesterday. The Washington Steel and Ordnance Company at Washington subscribed $5,000, the Denver Steel Workers, $8,600. A big Western gift of $100,000 was received yesterday from E. A. Doheny of Los Angeles, Cal.

Short Hills, N. J., with a population of 9,000, broke the per capita record yesterday with a total subscription of $17,500. Short Hills is a town of commuters, among them being several wealthy New York business men. Eighteen workers in the town have agreed to increase their personal subscription of $3,750 if others will raise a like sum, so that the total contribution of the community might reach $25,000.

Barnard College has oversubscribed its allotment by more than $3 000. The amount fixed for the college was $7 000. The campaign started there on Monday at noon, with a mass meeting, and closed Friday at noon with a grand total of $8,033.45. The drive was conducted under the leadership of Prof. Wilhelm Braun, professor of Germanic languages, who kept the student enthusiasm at a high pitch by maintaining a race between the classes for highest place in the amount subscribed.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 17.—The grand total subscribed in Philadelphia to the Y. M. C. A. war fund is $1,449,503. Today's total was $265,000. The minimum quota was $1,300,000. Announcement also was made that the State had exceeded its quota of $3,500,000 by several hundred thousand dollars.

A subscription of $65,000 obtained today is the largest local individual donation and was given on behalf of Mrs. William L. McLean for the erection of a Y. M. C. A. building in memory of Lieutenant Warden McLean, the first officer of the United States Reserve to lose his life in the service.

$3,457,200 FOR WAR NEEDS.

Red Cross to Buy Material for Hospital Supplies and Garments.

The American Red Cross announced yesterday that it would soon purchase $3,457,200 worth of material, which is to be made into surgical dressings, hospital garments, and knitted garments by the women of America. The surgical dressings and garments will be distributed among the British, French, American, and other allied troops in France.

The appropriation covers the purchase of 4,000,000 yards of flannel, 1,500,000 yards of unbleached muslin, 660,000 yards of blanketing, and 1,165,100 pounds of knitting yarn. The flannel will be made into bandages and pajamas, the muslin into bandages and bed shirts, and the blanketing will be made into bathrobes. The wool will be knitted into sweaters, socks, mufflers, wristlets and other garments by Red Cross workers.

As a result of not being fully informed concerning the procedure for the distribution of Red Cross Christmas packages, many friends of the Red Cross have been sending these packages to national headquarters. The Red Cross plan is to have all Christmas packets assembled by local chapters and auxiliaries. They are packed in cases at the workrooms and forwarded directly to division warehouses and there distributed through division offices. In New York City the New York County, Brooklyn, Richmond County, and Long Island City Chapters should receive all donations of Red Cross Christmas packets.

The Red Cross yesterday began its great drive for 500,000 members in Brooklyn. Although the exact figures will not be made known until tomorrow, it was estimated last night that the first day's work had resulted in an addition of about 12,000 names to the roll. The campaign will continue until next Saturday. One thousand enrolling stations have been established in the borough and the membership campaign is being carried on by 10,000 workers, divided into 1,000 teams. All the churches in the borough have been asked to aid in the drive.

FRAU OBER SUES THE METROPOLITAN

Singer, Dropped Along with German Opera Because of War, Alleges Broken Contract.

DETAILS OF SUIT LACKING

Bennd Loewy, Her Attorney, Promises "Remarkable" Disclosures When He Files Papers.

Margaret Ober, German contralto, who was dropped from the list of Metropolitan Opera singers when German opera was stricken from the program because we are at war with Germany, has served the Metropolitan Opera Company with notice of a suit for infringement of contract. It was admitted at the Metropolitan Opera House last night that the papers had been served, and Benno Loewy, counsel for Frau Ober, said that the papers in the action would be filed tomorrow morning.

Mr. Loewy refused last night to give the details of the complaint, saying he preferred to wait until Monday to make the story public, but he added that it was "a remarkable suit, a very striking suit, a most interesting suit." There was no statement forthcoming from the Metropolitan, but it can be stated that the attitude of the management of the Metropolitan is that it was within its rights when it ceased to pay Frau Ober a salary after it had no further use for her services because of the war.

Neither Mr. Loewy nor the Opera management would say what Frau Ober's salary had been or for what she was suing. Her contract, which was signed some months ago, was for the season of 1917-1918.

It was Frau Ober who fainted on the stage of the Metropolitan on the evening of April 2 last, shortly after news had been received from Washington that President Wilson had asked Congress to declare that a state of war existed between Germany and the United States. She was singing the prima donna rôle of the Wife of Bath in "The Canterbury Pilgrims." Soon after ex-Ambassador Gerard had called for three cheers for President Wilson and the audience had sung "The Star-Spangled Banner," and the opera had continued, Frau Ober stepped to the front of the stage, hesitated, and fell back in a faint. She was not able to reappear again during the performance.

Frau Ober came to the United States to sing for the Metropolitan three years ago. She has never learned to speak English well, and she has several German decorations. Her husband is Herr Arthur Arndt.

So far as is known, Frau Ober is the only one of the several German singers dropped from the roll of the Metropolitan to take umbrage at their treatment. When, several weeks before the opera season opened last week, it was decided not to have German opera sung this year it was at once seen that there were a number of German singers for whom there would be no use. Frau Gadski had not been re-engaged, nor was Goritz and Frauen Kurt and Ober, and Herren Bembach, Braun, and Weil, were dropped. It was Sembach with whom Frau Ober was singing when she fainted following the outburst of patriotism on the night of April 2. There remain Miss Frieda Hempel, who likes to sing "The Star-Spangled Banner" and who loves America, and is engaged to an American, and Mme. Matzenauer, a Hungarian by birth and an Italian by marriage, who has not only brought her parents to America, but says she fears arrest if she should go back to Germany, as happened in Austria to Mme. Destinn.

Mr. Loewy was born in Germany in 1854. He was educated in Berlin when a boy, and, coming to America when quite young, received his legal training at Columbia Law School.

WAR WORK FOR WELLESLEY.

Graduates' Club Raises $1,000 and Will Send 19 Women to France.

A luncheon was given by the New York Wellesley College Club at the Hotel Majestic yesterday for the purpose of obtaining volunteers for the Wellesley College Reconstruction Unit, which will consist of nineteen women, who will serve in France until the end of the war.

The members of this unit will devote themselves to the thousands of anaemic, tuberculous, underfed children, whom their timely aid and attention may save from starvation or invalidism. All applicants must speak, read, and write French and be proficient in motor driving, and each must provide $350 for her traveling expenses at sea, her incidental expenses on land and her personal outfit. There were more than one hundred volunteers, but only nineteen will be accepted.

Colonel Johnston Preston, who has made several trips to the fronts and has done substantial relief work among the wounded and suffering, told the 300 Wellesley graduates present of the need for help in suffering France. The committee in charge of the affair included Mrs. Brown Lindsey, Mrs. Robert Ludington, and Mrs. Frank Mason North. A fund of $1,000 was raised at the luncheon for the support of these workers in France.

GOETHALS FILES ROUTES.

First Step Taken in $15,000,000 Jersey Highway Project.

TRENTON, N. J., Nov. 17.—General George W. Goethals, supervising engineer of the New Jersey State Highway System, on which $15,000,000 is to be expended, today filed his first report on the work, which shows the routes mapped out with estimates of costs. No construction work will be done until April 1, 1918, with the exception of work which had to be done in the building of roads to Camp Dix at Wrightstown and Camp Merritt at Tenafly. On these two roads $118,000 will have to be spent by Jan. 1.

The proposed system, to be paid for by a direct State tax, has withstood legal and political attacks, and officials see no hindrance now to the actual beginning of the work. The State Highway Commission estimates the tax will make available $3,165,000 for the first year's work, in addition to which there will be $2,000 000 from the motor vehicle tax for repair work.

DEMANDS ACTION IN FOOD INQUIRIES

Mitchell Threatened to Resign State Post Unless There Was Co-ordination of the Work.

NEW SYSTEM IS OUTLINED

Hoover Expected to Sanction Reorganization So Conflicts and Loss of Time Will Be Avoided.

When F. C. Walcott, personal representative of National Food Administrator Hoover, returned to Washington, after a conference here Wednesday with Federal, State and City food administrators, he took with him a decision by John Mitchell, Chairman of the State Food Commission, to resign unless Mr. Hoover took action or authorized some plan that would co-ordinate the work of Federal, State and city departments so that in New York State something could be accomplished more than "get-together" meetings and the discussion of plans.

Under the new State food law the Food Commission has full authority to meet the existing food conditions and has an appropriation of $1,300,000 with which to do this work. Mr. Mitchell believes that even if things cannot be accomplished in a short time the various food authorities should by this time have worked out a plan of co-ordination so that they can meet the present situation by action. He felt also that any independent course of action by the State Commission would be impossible without this system of co-operation, as what the State might do would conflict with the plans of the Federal Government. There has been no hint of friction among the various bodies working for food conservation here and all are now waiting a final word from Washington.

Mr. Walcott is expected back in New York tomorrow, and it is believed that he will bring with him the sanction of the National Food Administrator for a plan of reorganization in this city and state. The first step in harmony will be the housing of the City Food Administrator, the State Food Commission, and the City Department of Markets under one roof. Under the plan now discussed Arthur Williams, City Administrator of the National Administration, will be the consulting head and the ranking officer as representative of the Federal Government. Mr. Mitchell, who it is expected will receive a Government commission, is to become the executive head, and in that position will relieve Mr. Williams from much of the detail of the work. The City Commissioner of Markets, under the proposed plan, will assume charge of local food affairs as they affect the city. In this work the City Commissioner will retain all the authority vested in him by law, devoting his time to the development of plans for local relief and conservation.

Each department consolidated will carry out in co-ordination the functions for which it was created, but in such a way that there will be no conflict of authority, duplication of work, or loss of time. Mr. Williams's work will be increased, for it is expected that he will form committees to investigate and handle different phases of the campaign affecting the national situation. One of these committees will, it is said, be an independent Finance Committee to carry on work without adding to the financial burden of the Federal Government.

While the financial resources of Federal, State, and city organizations are to be kept separate, these interests will in practice be pooled for greater economy and to enable more to be done at less expenditure. The work is to be carried on along broad lines. The presence on the Federal Government will enable this scope to be followed, for in the past work carried on by the city, it is said, has been handicapped by lack of authority to deal with matters outside the jurisdiction of the city. Now Federal co-operation will allow inquiry to proceed if necessary into interstate.

Out of the three agencies will be formed a general food council. Its divisions will be production and live stock, transportation, distribution, and prices.

Under the new law the State Food Commission has, perhaps, greater power in New York than has the Food Administrator, and it will apply that power in co-operation with the nation and city. The State Department has an appropriation of $1,000,000 and an additional $500,000 taken over when other State departments were consolidated under the new act. No appropriation has been made by the Government for the work in this State.

Having this appropriation and power to act, Mr. Mitchell was of the opinion, it is said, that Mr. Hoover should commit himself to some plan of action. He said he wanted organization first so that action could be possible. It is said that when he delivered his ultimatum to Mr. Walcott he set yesterday afternoon as the time when he would hand his resignation to Governor Whitman. Later he agreed to defer action until next Saturday.

The Federal Government examination of the books of a food jobber suspected of overcharging in sugar was finished yesterday and the firm was exonerated. No dubious business methods were disclosed, and it was brought out that the complaint had been made in Washington by a discharged employe of the jobber.

Administrator Williams announced yesterday that as a result of his efforts to stop retailers selling sugar only with grocery orders, two chain store syndicates had notified him they would abolish the practice.

SUGAR SITUATION BETTER.

Relief Found in Distribution of 9,000 Tons of Neutral Supplies.

The sugar situation is improving, it was said yesterday by men in the trade. The chief factor of the week has been the distribution of 9,000 tons of neutral sugar by the Food Administration. The International Sugar Committee has arranged for the purchase of some old-crop Cuban raws and some Peruvian, Venezuelan, and Philippine sugars, afloat and in this port, at 6.90 cents, duty paid. The committee has also arranged for the purchase of some nearby sugars at the same price for Canada. Analyzing conditions in the sugar market, Frank C. Lowry, sales manager of the Federal Sugar Refining Company, said:

"Current stocks of sugar in the United States and Cuba together amount to 69,082 tons, as against 200,844 at this time last year, a decrease of 131,812 tons. This explains the existence of the highest prices for sugar since the civil war, and the shortage of stocks is explained by several factors. The most important is the export to date by Cuba of 263,647 more tons of sugar to the United Kingdom than in 1916 and 207,543 less to the ports of the United States north of Hatteras. At present there are about 9,000 tons of refined sugar in storage in New York, purchased last April for the Russian Government. The authorities are now endeavoring to obtain legal authority to commandeer this sugar and release it to the public."

PROMISE FAIRNESS TO ALL INDUSTRIES

Lovett and Garfield Agree to Apply No War Restrictions Without a Full Hearing.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—Robert S. Lovett, Chairman of the Priority Board, and H. A. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator, announced today that they would endeavor to place every safeguard about industry, if steps were necessary to curtail shipments of coal to the producers of non-essentials and to restrict the transportation facilities.

While admitting that the situation needed close scrutiny, and that the war-time industries must have first consideration, the officials issued statements which were intended to eliminate panicky feeling. Ex-Judge Lovett said that no action would be taken without "reasonable notice and an opportunity to be heard." Mr. Garfield expressed the hope that voluntary curtailment might make more drastic action unnecessary.

The situation today assumed great importance in the official deliberations, and while no definite policy was proclaimed there was a distinct tendency to inform the many industries and the financial interests involved that the Government was prepared to work for an equitable readjustment of conditions to solve the problems faced. Judge Lovett announced that he would issue no further orders concerning restriction of the coal output except on the advice of Mr. Garfield. A formal statement by him read:

"While the situation may change, I am not at this time contemplating any further action with respect to transportation of non-essentials. Priority Order No. 2, with regard to open-top cars, went as far as it seemed wise to go in dealing with that problem, by restricting the transportation of non-essentials. Conditions, however, will be constantly observed. Whether the coal shortage requires restriction of the coal supply of non-essential industries is a question for the Fuel Administrator, Dr. Garfield, to determine; and if any priority orders become necessary in the furtherance of his policy in that regard they will be made only upon his request."

Mr. Garfield followed it up with this announcement:

"If voluntary economy on the part of industrial and domestic consumers, added to the increased coal production of 1917, which will reach a total of over 50,000,000 tons, does not provide fuel enough for the war and to keep our people warm there will come a time when some limitation will have to be imposed upon manufacturers of nonwar products. In such an event the business world may feel sure that all the bearings of such limitations will be given thorough consideration, and that the necessary coal will be obtained with the least possible interference with industry.

"Arbitrary limitation is a last resort and to be avoided if possible. In many cases industrial concerns have already begun a voluntary curtailment of their use of coal. Such efforts will receive the fullest support and encouragement of the Fuel Administration, including technical advice on the use of fuel. The important point for everyone to remember is that if coal is now consumed in the old 'peace-time' way the supply will fall 50,000,000 tons short of necessary requirements in spite of large increase in production. As I have stated before, the Fuel Administration is determined that sufficient coal for the war, for public utilities and for domestic consumers shall be provided.

"The way to prevent those losses incident upon limitation of industry is for every consumer of coal to cut off waste and unnecessary consumption with an iron hand to start on this intensive course of conservation without a moment's delay."

WOMAN GETS COUNTY JOB.

Made Deputy Assistant District Attorney in Kings County.

The first of Brooklyn's newly enfranchised women to be appointed to public office is Miss Helen P. McCormick of 186 Prospect Place. District Attorney Harry E. Lewis of Kings County late yesterday afternoon announced her appointment as a Deputy Assistant District Attorney. Her salary is to be fixed at between $2,000 and $3,000 a year, and her specialty in the office will be the handling of women's cases.

Miss McCormick is a graduate of Erasmus High School, and later went to Dartmouth College to take a special course in teaching mental defectives. In 1908 she went to the Brooklyn Law School, being graduated in 1912, and was admitted to the bar in the following year. For a time she taught mental defectives in schools in the Bay Ridge district of Brooklyn, and was afterward appointed a factory inspector by the New York State Department of Labor.

It is considered probable that Miss McCormick will take charge of mental defective cases, especially of women, in her new post. She is a member of the Professional Women's League and Chairman of the Woman Suffrage League of the Tenth Assembly District, Brooklyn, and is reported to be a Republican in politics.

A Message from the Council of National Defense

--"We found few merchants who have worked out the problem of deliveries with your thoroughness"--

This is an extract from a letter to us from the Council of National Defense, dated October 26.

It refers to the manner in which we co-ordinated our delivery system with the Government's demand for more men for War Service.

We thank our patrons whose considerate co-operation in taking small packages with them and in allowing us more time for deliveries, has enabled us to maintain this high standard of delivery efficiency.

For the past month we have been making five deliveries a day, viz: at 9,11,2,4 and 5:30 o'clock. Every order that has reached us 30 minutes before any one of these delivery periods, has automatically been delivered during that period.

Help us prevent congestions in our 11 and 2 o'clock deliveries by specifying, when leaving orders, that it will be satisfactory to you to have them delivered by the 9 o'clock morning delivery. This will enable us to give you even better service, without impeding our Government's desire to conserve the Nation's man-power.

We earnestly ask your co-operation in this measure of national defense

LABOR MEN CHANGE TIME FOR MEETINGS

Federation's Annual Convention Hereafter Will Be Held in June Instead of November.

TAKEN AS POLITICAL MOVE

Gompers Explains That Only "Partisan Politics," Not Politics, Is Barred by the Organization.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Nov. 17.—After holding conventions for thirty-five years in the month of November, the American Federation of Labor hereafter will meet in June. This was decided upon at today's session of the thirty-seventh annual convention after a debate during which remarks as to possible political significance in the move were made by some of the delegates.

The talk of politics prompted President Samuel Gompers to state emphatically that the federation's policy of non-participation in partisan politics had not and would not be changed by the adoption of the resolution.

"We will continue to fight for our friends and try to defeat our enemies, no matter what their politics or creed," he said.

The change in the time of meeting was made after the Committee on Laws brought in a report recommending the adoption of a resolution by John B. Lennon so to amend the constitution. The motion to substitute June for November was carried by a vote of 255 to 21.

Delegate Fisher of Montana declared that a political issue had been injected into the discussion of the report and resolution.

"I fail to understand," he said, "how the federation can lay down a political platform unless the membership at large can discuss these matters. If the members in the locals and other labor organizations cannot discuss politics, how can they discuss them here?"

Delegate Berry declared that if the purpose of the resolution was "to line up for the next Congressional election," that fact should be made known.

It was in response to Fisher and Berry that President Gompers made this statement:

"The Chair desires to make some explanation of a remark made by a delegate on this subject. I did not care to make an explanation just then, while the subject was under discussion, for I did not care to influence the vote of the delegates one way or another, even if I could.

"The remark in regard to the prohibition of the discussion of politics in local unions, central bodies, or State federations—if that impression is given forth—is quite erroneous. What the constitution of the American Federation of Labor declares is that partisan politics—not politics—shall not have a place in the labor movement, for, as a matter of fact, there isn't any economic act which we can take or make but what has political influence.

"The American labor movement has influenced the political activities of our Government, national, State, and municipal, more than any other group of people in the United States."

The convention after five days of speechmaking buckled down to routine work today and disposed of a number of important resolutions. The delegates also asked President Gompers to name a committee to report on alleged shortage of labor in some sections of the country, a claim which the resolution declared was not based upon facts, but arose from a desire of employers to substitute female for male and unskilled for skilled labor. The committee appointed by Mr. Gompers was instructed to report to the present convention.

The alleged use of positions as representatives of labor in Baltimore for improper and dishonest purposes was among the first questions acted upon at today's session. The charge submitted by representatives of the International Longshoremen's Union stated that the labor movement in Baltimore was suffering from the actions of some labor representatives "by reason of their grafting and their positions as representatives of labor are being used to their selfish and personal benefits."

The resolution asked for an immediate investigation, and after a brief debate, in which President Gompers said he had already addressed communications to persons who seemed to be under suspicion, the committee's recommendation was adopted.

A resolution criticising Judge Hayden of the District Court of Roxbury, Mass., for an alleged unfair statement regarding the loyalty and patriotism of labor and calling upon him either to prove or retract his statements, was adopted with the demand for the retraction eliminated. For the demand the committee substituted the comment that "such utterances indicate a biased mind and do not tend to maintain confidence in the courts."

The abolition of all private employment bureaus and the enactment of laws providing that all labor be employed through the National Free Employment Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, recommended in a resolution from the Committee on State Organizatoin, was approved without debate.

The organization of some million and a half Mexican workers now in the United States was urged in a resolution submitted by Arizona delegates and favorably reported out of committee. The resolution, which was unanimously adopted by the convention, confers full powers upon the Pan American Federation of Labor Conference Committee for the period of the war to effect the desired organization. The resolution does not as had been reported, contemplate participation by the federation in organizing beyond the borders of the United States.

After the morning session the convention adjourned until Monday. President Gompers spent the afternoon at a conference of delegates representing the garment-making trades of New York, at which an effort was made to smooth out some of the difficulties that have arisen there during the last year or two.

PAYMENTS ON LOAN REFLECTED BY BANKS

War Dealings Result in Gain of $73,500,000 in Reserve Deposits of Federal System.

INCREASE GOLD HOLDINGS

$11,000,000 More Taken In During the Week—New Advances to the Allies Total $105,000,000.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—Payments to Reserve Banks of the 18 per cent. installment on account of the second Liberty Loan and redemption by the Government of $300,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness are reflected to some extent in the weekly bank statement issued by the Federal Reserve Board. These operations affect Government deposits, which show an increase of $159,700,000; members' reserve deposits, which increased about $73,500,000, and most of all uncollected items, i. e., checks and drafts on banks both within and outside of the district deposited with Federal Reserve Banks, which show an increase of $156,700,000.

A considerable part of these items is made up of so-called transfer drafts, mainly eastern exchange, bought by Western Reserve Banks, and for which immediate credit is given to member banks. By far the larger part of payments on account of the Liberty Loan was made apparently in the form of book credits and United States certificates of indebtedness. Aggregate gold holdings show a further increase of about $11,000,000, while the Federal Reserve note circulation increased by about $40,000,000.

The New York bank reports a decrease of $14,400,000 in reserve and an increase of $23,800,000 in reserve deposits, mainly from payments of reserves by newly admitted members, and decreases in both Government and non-members' clearing deposits. Its bill holdings decreased about $31,000,000 following the liquidation in some volume of member banks' collateral notes secured largely by Government bonds and certificates. The bank reports an increase of about $150,000,000 in its holdings of United States certificates of indebtedness which fall due during the coming week. The bank disbursed to foreign Governments a total of $105,000,000, of which $50,000,000 went to Great Britain $40,000,000 to France, and $15,000,000 to Italy.

Discounts held by the banks decreased $22,300,000, the larger decrease reported by the New York bank being partially offset by substantial increases shown under this head by Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Chicago.

Nearly two-thirds of the discounted paper on hand is in the form of member banks' collateral notes, the total held, $319,000,000, indicating net liquidation of $78,900,000 of this class of paper. About $208,200,000 of these notes, compared with $300,300,000 the week before, are secured by Liberty bonds and United States certificates of indebtedness. Acceptances on hand show an increase of $12,900,000, New York and San Francisco reporting the largest gains for the week.

Outside of New York the banks show net liquidation of about $4,500,000 of United States short-term securities. Other earning assets show little or no change. Total earning assets show an increase of $136,400,000 and constitute at present 1,387 per cent. of the banks' paid-in capital, compared with 1,207 per cent. the week before. Of the total, discounts constitute 52.7 per cent., United States securities 26.2 per cent., acceptances 21 per cent., and warrants 0.1 per cent.

Payments on capital account by newly admitted members are reported by four Reserve banks, the total paid in capital of the system showing an increase of $1,346,000. The list of institutions which paid for stock of the Reserve banks includes, among others, the Union Trust Company, the United States Mortgage and Trust Company, and Columbia Trust Company of New York; also the Wayne County and Home Savings Bank of Detroit, and the First Trust and Savings Bank of Chicago.

Government deposits show large increases at the Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland, Richmond, Chicago and St. Louis banks, while increases in member banks' reserve deposits were heaviest at the Boston, New York, Chicago and San Francisco banks. The non-member banks' clearing account shows a further reduction following admission to membership of a number of large trust companies in New York City and the transfer of their clearing accounts to the reserve deposit column.

There has been an addition of $43,236,000 to the total of Federal Reserve notes outstanding, all the agents reporting substantial note issues for the week. The total of $1,038,620,000 outstanding is secured by $629,906,000 of gold and $431,182,000 of paper. The banks report an actual note circulation of $972,585,000, an increase of $40,073,000 for the week.

WAR TAX PUZZLES HALT COLLECTIONS

Internal Revenue Offices Are Deluged with Questions About Autos and Phonographs.

ADVISE READING OF LAW

Some Theatres Have Taken Advantage of Levy to Raise Prices, Says Collector Edwards.

Misconceptions on the part of many persons regarding the application of the new war taxes on articles of everyday use threaten to handicap the Internal Revenue offices in New York in collecting taxes actually provided for in the Revenue act passed by Congress on Oct. 3 last. Collectors of internal revenue in this city said yesterday that while they had only the highest commendation for the large number of conscientious citizens who were flocking to their offices in quest of miscellaneous information covering office and household articles thought to be taxable, the time required to answer the inquiries was proving a serious drain on the revenue staffs, which already are overburdened with work incidental to the collection of the main taxes.

William H. Edwards, Collector of the Wall Street District, said:

"The conscientious and patriotically inclined citizen desirous of meeting his obligation to the Government as contained in the war revenue law could assist the officers of the Government materially by procuring copies of the law and studying them in the office or at home. In this way they would save themselves the time and bother required to make a personal visit to the revenue offices, and at the same time make it possible for our clerical force to pay undivided attention to the many arduous details preparatory to the collection of the big taxes.

"Many persons are under the impression that an automobile or a phonograph in private use is subject to some kind of a Federal tax. This, of course, is erroneous. Automobiles, automobile trucks, automobile wagons, motorcycles, piano-players, phonographs, graphophones and talking machines, sold on and after Oct. 4 last by the manufacturer, producer or importer, are taxable, tax to be paid by the seller. Furthermore, one-half of the full tax was due from certain dealers on stocks in their possession on Oct. 4. However, any of these articles which on Oct. 4 were owned by a private individual for private use are not subject to tax. Machines used for dictation purposes, like dictaphones and dictographs, are not subject to tax.

"Socalled 'side cars' to be attached to motorcycles are not taxable unless sold in combination with the motorcycle, in which case tax attaches to the completed article. An automobile body is not taxable as an automobile when sold alone; when sold in combination with a chassis, the tax rests upon the completed article. Socalled 'used' or 'second-hand' automobiles are not taxable. The chassis is held to be an automobile and is taxed as such. A usable or substantially complete automobile, produced by asembling certain parts of trucks or cars, either new or second-hand, is subject to the tax. However, any of these articles owned privately on Oct. 4, 1917, are not taxable."

Collector Edwards said that it had come to his attention that some theatres had taken advantage of the war tax to raise their prices.

"This," Collector Edwards said, "is done ingeniously, and the theatregoer pays the raised tax and often remains under the impression that the advance is entirely due to the war tax imposed. Thus, a ticket for which the former price was 50 cents is sold by the theatre for 60 cents, including the war tax. As a matter of fact, the tax on a fifty-cent ticket is 5 cents, and the complete charge therefor should be 55 cents.

"It is my opinion that the tax should be collected on the actual price at which a ticket is first sold, regardless of whether such price is over or under the regular box office price as printed on the face of the ticket. For example: If a $2 ticket is actually sold for $1, the tax is 10 cents; if sold for $3, the tax is 30 cents, and not 20 cents, which would be the amount of tax if the ticket were sold for $2. This, of course, affects sales made to speculators and cut-rate brokers by theatres. If the theatre sells to a speculator a $2 ticket for $2.25, the tax on such ticket is 23 cents. However, if a $2 ticket is sold by the theatre to a cut-rate broker for 75 cents, the tax is 8 cents."

The misunderstanding over the levy on club dues continues to bother officials. Collector Edwards said yesterday the 10 per cent. tax on club dues should be computed on any sum paid on and after Nov. 1 last, irrespective of the period of membership such payment covers. Accordingly, if dues were paid before Nov. 1, even for a period extending beyond that date, no tax accrued. On the other hand, if a person was in arrears and did not pay his dues until Nov. 1, the tax would have to be paid.

AT FALL RIVER MILLS.

Unable to Accept Further Orders for Immediate Delivery.

Special to The New York Times.

FALL RIVER, Nov. 17.—The New England cotton goods markets have been strong all week and sales were larger than they have been for several weeks past. The strength of cotton goods may be shown by the fact that certain constructions have been marked up as much as a quarter of a cent a yard and indications are that goods will go still higher. While there has been a very substantial demand for wide goods, the narrow division of the market is likewise very strong. In fact so keen has been the call for various narrow constructions that manufacturers are not in a position to accept any new business which calls for immediate deliveries.

Relative to 27-inch 64-60 goods, buyers were offering 8 cents a yard for all the goods they could obtain, but mills were not in a position to take on additional business. All constructions of narrow goods are very strong and prices are higher in most instances than they were a week ago. Buyers are anxious about the future because they perceive disturbing elements which are destined to cause much uneasiness later.

The mills are in a position where they can take matters as they come. Some of the larger New York converters and printers have attempted to interest New England manufacturers in goods deliveries to begin as far ahead as March of next year. Sateens and twills are much sought after and mills report a good business. Some mills will not consider business at market prices, but are holding off for higher prices.

Reports from spinners of yarns are to the effect that they continue to do a brisk business. With the demand for cloth increasing some of the cloth mills have been compelled to come into the market and purchase their supplies. Aside from the demand mills will have to get more for their cloth because of the agitation on the part of the 30,000 or more operatives employed in the mills for higher rate of wages. Never in the history of the textile industry have wages been as high as they are now and indications are that they will go higher. The Cotton Manufacturers' Association has voted to grant the operatives a 10 per cent. advance in wages, but the latter insist upon 15 per cent. The total sales of cloth for the week are estimated between 250,000 and 300,000 pieces.

ERASMUS IS WINNER OF BROOKLYN TITLE

Boys' High Downed in Deciding Football Battle at Washington Park.

MANHATTAN TEAMS TIED

De Witt Clinton and Morris Fail to Score in Championship Game at Polo Grounds.

Football teams representing Morris High School of the Bronx and De Witt Clinton High School of Manhattan, struggling for the scholastic championship of the two boroughs, battled to a scoreless tie yesterday at the Polo Grounds. At Washington Park, Brooklyn, the Erasmus Hall H. S. eleven gained the championship of Brooklyn by trouncing the strong Boys' High School team by a score of 33 to 6.

The De Witt Clinton team emerged from its game with Morris covered with glory. This eleven, reported to be out of condition and with defeats by less worthy elevens registered against it, was considered by the Morris clan more in the light of a victim than a rival aggregation. Some 4,000 schoolboys who witnessed the conflict saw an undreamed of transformation. While neither team scored any points against the other the glory of the game all went to the Clinton athletes for their feat in holding the strong Bronx team in check.

The Morris eleven, after riding roughshod over its last two opponents, including Stuyvesant, which held Clinton to a scoreless tie two weeks ago, was disconcerted by the strength of the Red and Black. Clinton was on the defensive most of the time, and it was so strongly woven that the Bronx boys were baffled.

In the first and final quarters, when a Morris score threatened, the Clinton defense tightened and sturdily beat back the attack.

In the first quarter the Morris eleven was within four yards of the Clinton goal line only to lose the ball on downs. In the second period the Clinton players showed to advantage and assumed the offensive, but without success. Good playing by De Stefano, Clinton's star player, and Wacker enabled the Red and Black eleven to force the ball to the Morris fifteen-yard line, but the whistle called a halt there. So it was in the third quarter, with the Clinton team showing best until near the close of the period.

The Morris clan kept the ball always in Clinton territory in the final quarter, but never successfully got past the Clinton line for a score, although a variety of plays were tried in the effort. In this period D. Kassner and Captain Carney each tried for field goals from Clinton's twenty-yard line, but both attempts went astray.

The game between Erasmus Hall High School and Boys High School was played as part of a double-header. The other half of the bill resulted in a victory for the Manual Training High School over Poly Prep by a score of 6 to 0.

Boys' High failed to show its usual skill, while the Erasmus eleven was exceptionally strong. In the last quarter only did the Boys eleven play anywhere near its standard of former games, and it was in this quarter that the team was saved from humiliation of a shutout. Resorting to the line-plunging game in the final period, the Boys' team finally managed to get the pigskin on their opponents five-yard line, and from this point Bloomgarten went over for a touchdown, Spiers failing at the try for goal. Once before in this same period the team had a chance to score, but lost the ball on downs on the Erasmus two-yard line.

Erasmus clearly outplayed Boy's High in the other three-quarters. Frequent runs around end, with spectacular use of the forward pass, played a major part in the Erasmus victory. McPhee was the star, taking an important part in almost every play and scoring two touchdowns, with three goals from touchdown. Goebel also tallied two touchdowns, while Meistrall accounted for one.

The Manual Training-Poly Prep contest was a keenly contested struggle, and found the former team pulling out a victory in the final quarter. A thrilling run of fifty-five yards by Meszczenski, the Manual Training full back, after he had intercepted a forward pass on the Poly thirty-five-yard line, gave his team the only score of the game and victory. Daisley failed at the try for goal.

Flushing High School's football team swamped the Long Island Aggies on the former's gridiron yesterday. The final score found Flushing resting easily on the long end of a 70 to 0 tally. Alford, with four touchdowns, Townsend and Bleecker with three each, and Hallock, with two, were the stars for Flushing.

Mount Vernon High School's eleven triumphed over the Yonkers High School team on the former's gridiron by 27 to 13 in a game that practically decides the scholastic championship of Westchester. KINSELLA WINS AT SQUASH.

Defeats Mullins in First of a Series of Matches for Red Cross.

Walter A. Kinsella, holder of the world's professional squash tennis championship, won the first of a series of matches for the benefit of the Red Cross at the courts of the Apawamis Golf Club yesterday when he defeated James Mullins, professional at the Racquet and Tennis Club, 17—14, 2—15, 15—12, 17—18, 15—9. Kinsella allowed his opponent five aces, and this balanced the skill of the rivals so well that a brilliant match resulted.

Mullins, while not as proficient a wielder of the racquet as Kinsella, was able to force the champion to extend himself at every stage of the contest. He had a remarkable ability to make gets of Kinsella's hard drives, and some of the rallies lasted for several minutes rather than the customary few seconds. It was the ability to change pace that really turned the balance in favor of Kinsella.

There was a big gallery of enthusiasts on hand to see the contest, and a substantial sum was collected for the Red Cross. In an amateur match Frederick S. Keeler, the Columbia Club expert, defeated W. J. Knapp of the Squash Club in straight games at 15—10, 15—8.

W. AND J. DEFEATED BY RODGERS'S PASS

West Virginia Star, Stopped by Line, Tosses Ball to Teammate for Victory.

Special to The New York Times.

FAIRMOUNT, W. Va., Nov. 17.—West Virginia failed to carry out its usual program here today against Washington and Jefferson, scoring a touchdown and kicking the goal in the first half and failing to score thereafter. In previous games the Mountaineers have been slow at starting and strong at the finish. West Virginia won the game, however, by 7 to 0.

The West Virginia touchdown was rightly earned when Hager fell on a W. and J. fumble on his own 30-yard line. Rodgers followed with a run of thirty yards. A forward pass from Rodgers to King netted thirty-six yards and placed the ball on the W. and J. 4-yard line with first down. On the fourth down Rodgers looped a short pass far out to the side and over the goal to King, who touched the ball down.

West Virginia had a chance to score just after the game started, when Bailey recovered a W. and J. fumble on the 36-yard line. An offside play gave West Virginia a first down on the W. and J. 30-yard line. Lentz and Rodgers made a first down, and then Lewis reeled off 12 yards. Rodgers was hurled at the W. and J. line four times without avail, however, and the ball was lost on downs on the 4-yard line. King returned McCreight's punt to the 12-yard line, but forward passes failed, and West Virginia again lost the ball.

Fiber's kick was high and far down the field. It hit Rodgers on the shoulder and then rolled to the 20-yard line, where W. and J. recovered. The Red and Black could not gain, however, and West Virginia took the ball on downs on her 15-yard line. This was soon followed by the West Virginia touchdown, and the half ended.

At the opening of the second half W. and J. got the ball on the West Virginia 40-yard line, where McCreight attempted a field goal, which West Virginia blocked. Soon afterward McCreight's long, low kick got away from Lewis and rolled to the West Virginia 22-yard line, where W. and J. recovered. Stobbs and McCreight made two first downs, and with a first down earned on the 2-yard line, McCreight fumbled. With this bad break the last chance for a W. and J. score faded. Rodgers played wonderful football for West Virginia, and Ice and Hager were also much in the limelight.

The line-up:

West Va., (7.)	Position.	W. and J., (0.)
Mills	L. E.	Carroll
Ice	L. T.	Henry
Meridith	L. G.	Wimberly

NEW HAVEN, Nov. 17.—Brilliant work on the soccer gridiron, on the part of the 'Varsity team of the College of the City of New York in the first inter-college match essayed by the Gotham students this season, gave them the victory over Yale by 1 goal to 0 on Yale Field, this afternoon. The game favored C. C. N. Y. even more than the score indicated, for the visitors kept up a running fire of shots throughout the game, keeping Yale largely on the defensive. Lehrman, Coine, and Roberts had a number of good openings for the Yale net, which yielded no results.

In a sweepstakes Conroy, with 83, 14—79, led home G. V. Haggerty, 99, 18—81.

Neōlin Soles Protect Health and Purse

MUDDIED crossings and the thin but dangerous film of water on pavements after thaws and showers cause many a cold. Against such colds Neōlin Soles protect you because they are waterproof.

The ordinary leather sole is not waterproof. After it has once been thoroughly wetted, it becomes spongy and porous, so that it soaks up —literally breathes in—the water and moisture underfoot.

Waterproof Neōlin Soles protect your health and purse by protecting you from such moisture, from the colds it causes, and from the damage it does to uppers.

Shoes soled with waterproof Neōlin keep their shape, look well, and last longer.

And Neōlin Soles themselves wear from two to six times as long as ordinary leather and cost no more. They are more comfortable because they are more flexible. New shoes soled with them need no breaking in.

When you do your fall and winter buying be sure to do what eight million Americans have already done—get shoes with Neōlin Soles.

And if you have a pair of shoes in need of re-soling, have it done with Neōlin Soles. You can get them on men's, women's and children's shoes—in black, white, or tan—and the genuine always bears the brand Neōlin.

Mark that mark—stamp it on your memory—Neōlin

NEW STEEL PRICES STIMULATE TRADE

Large Tonnage Is Placed at Mills for Delivery to the End of the Year.

FEDERAL ORDERS HEAVY

Shells for Britain and France Being Turned Out in Addition to Those for Our Guns.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 17.—The setting of additional prices for the regulation of the iron and steel industry has been shifted from the War Industries Board to the American Iron and Steel Institute. The first named practically completed its work as to price-setting, when it announced its third batch of basis prices on Nov. 5, an arrangement having been made whereby the details as to extras, differentials, analyses, &c., would be left to the institute, as well as the setting of prices upon various commodities related more or less directly to the basis materials upon which the War Industries Board had reached agreements with the manufacturers.

The sheet market has been quite active since the announcement of set prices for the industry early last week. During the period of uncertainty the wants of many consumers had been accumulating, while some of the mills had cleared off their order books fairly well, so that the way was open for the transaction of considerable business, and there has been a large tonnage placed, chiefly for delivery to the end of the year, with some business running into January.

The iron and steel market as a whole is moderately active, and business is being done, under the system of set prices, with more smoothness than was expected. Occasional buyers have difficulty in making any purchases, but producers seem to be taking care of their regular customers in a fairly satisfactory manner. Priority orders received from Washington have quickened activities at some of the mills, after a curtailment on account of coal shortage.

Discussing Gerard's Talk.

Pittsburgh capitalists have been talking about a remark made by ex-Ambassador James W. Gerard at the Chamber of Commerce luncheon on Tuesday, when he said:

"The least we can do to compete with this kind of business—to protect ourselves at least—is to hit the Sherman law on the head and adopt some legislation that would permit our American business men to combine against this socialistic and socialized scheme. Unless we do we will be ruined."

He was speaking about German methods and German success, and followed up the remark with the hope that the Webb law would pass Congress. The iron and steel men see a chance to combine for furthering export trade, and are hoping that the bill may be pushed through. They feel that the Sherman law is going to be a new and altogether different issue than formerly. It is anti-trust legislation. The new issue may be trust legislation positive, not negative.

The American Iron and Steel Institute has announced the new discounts for boiler tubes, pursuant to the arrangement whereby the manufacturers themselves develop prices for other prices which are in harmony with the prices on basis materials, after the War Industries Board had arranged certain basis prices with the manufacturers. So it comes that Washington announced a basis price for steel pipe equivalent to a 51 per cent. card, and the institute now announced prices for boiler tubes.

The steel boiler tube card of April 1, 1915, was based on 75 per cent. (3½ to 4½-inch) on less than car loads, and represented substantially the low point in the market. The new card is based on 30 per cent., not only for the customary base sizes, but also on the larger sizes, which run up to 13-inch. On account of the very great scarcity of boiler tubes and the importance of stimulating production, decidedly high prices would be expected to be set at this time, yet the advance is rather small compared with many other products. Taking bars, shapes, and plates at 1.05 cents as their low point, present set prices average about triple. In general the present iron and steel prices are double, or a trifle more than double, the average prices obtainable from 1904 to 1913 inclusive, but the present prices for steel boiler tubes are not double the ten-year average.

Limited Supply of Steel Sheets.

The American Sheet and Tin Plate Company has its books open for sheet contracts with manufacturing consumers for the first half of 1918, although the regular commercial trade will be limited. The reasons for this are that there is no assurance of a full supply of sheet bars, and there will be a heavy demand on the blooming mills for large forging billets, for shells, as well as demand for blooming mill slabs for plate mills, and then it will be necessary to supply the tin mills as fully as possible on account of the necessity of conserving the canning crops. There is a considerable tonnage of automobile sheets still due, and it is possible that no additional tonnage will be allotted these customers.

The market is quoted strong at the Government limits, as follows: Black sheets, 28 gauge, 5c.; tin mill black, 28 gauge, 5c.; galvanized, 28 gauge, 6.25c.; blue annealed, 10 gauge, 4.25c.; painted corrugated, 28 gauge, lb., 5.20c.; galvanized corrugated, lb., 6.30c. In the case of tin plate the allotments are being made to the various mills by the Tin Plate Distribution Committee, operating at the request of the Government. No business is being booked from jobbers at this time.

When changes now being effected by the new interests in the Pittsburgh Rolls Corporation are complete, the corporation's plant will have a monthly capacity of 2,000 tons of the high grade, chilled, and sand iron rolls in which it specializes. The mill is now running at the rate of 1,300 tons a month. The company has recently enlarged its export business, and is now working on orders for Italy, Japan, and Australia, some of which will be delivered late this year and some early in 1918.

Resume Making of Shells.

After a suspension of shell making early this year, the business is being resumed on a larger scale than ever, all the former shell factories being put to use and a search made for other places. Only a small proportion of the shells now being turned out are for the United States, the greater part going to France, with Great Britain the second largest buyer.

Our Government is now placing heavily, recent estimates saying that not less than 50,000,000 shells must be delivered before Oct. 1, 1918, of which 33,000,000 will be 75s. Some orders have gone to Canada, where there were a few idle plants. The present shell steel program of the United States Government is understood to involve about 1,500,000 tons, the major part being large forging billets and the balance rolled rounds for the 75s. Only a small part of this business has been placed, the great majority being held back for a while.

The tin plate mills are now prepared to consider the requirements of their regular customers for the half year to July 1, 1918. It is believed that there will be enough tonnage to go around and meet all legitimate requirements, though some nonessentials will have to be cut out, and there may be little, if any, tin plate for export except such as is required to help win the war. This must go at the set price of $7.75.

VILLA ISSUES CALL FOR UNITED MEXICO

Protests He Is a Patriot and Again Challenges Murguia to Fight Duel.

PRESIDIO, Texas, Nov. 17.—Wearing his campaign costume of hip boots, high Panama hat, and flannel shirt, Francisco Villa is again in the saddle in Mexico, at the head of a new revolutionary movement, which he calls El Partido de la Convention. His headquarters have been in Ojinaga, opposite here, since his troops captured the town from the Federals Tuesday night.

The rebel leader wears a black beard, a relic of his recent trip through Mexico to confer with his chieftains and heads of other movements, whom he asserts he has correlated under his leadership for the first time in more than a year.

Villa today authorized the following statement for The Associated Press:

"Upon taking possession by force of arms of this town, which I found in the power of the so-called Constitutionalists who criminally defended it for Venustiano Carranza, the traitor and despot, I think it my duty to make the following declaration in order that once more my aims and motives may be shown to the world to be patriotic and noble.

"First of all, I have no personal ambitions, but my earnest desire, which I have already expressed, is that my people may obtain unity and my country peace, and to that end bring together the principal revolutionists who, since 1910, have been striving to attain that end. Contrary to everything they have said of me, I wish to make it known that I will strive with valor and decision against the enemy, but I will be magnanimous in victory, the proof of which was the recent occurrence here of turning over to the Carranza Consul in Presidio, Texas, the Carranza wounded who were made prisoners in Ojinaga, and also the release of prisoners taken, incorporating them in our army because they decided they were on the wrong side.

Call on Carranza Soldiers.

"I wish now to make a solemn call to all Mexicans in general, and in particular to Carranza soldiers, to notice how I have conducted myself in comparison to the conduct of Francisco Murguia, in the State of Chihuahua, because these chiefs assassinate and torment all those who fight against them and who are taken prisoners. In comparison to this I offer all guarantees to friend and foe alike.

"I wish here also to make a formal and energetic protest before the Mexican nation and the world of the inhumanity of the laws of suspension of guarantees just decreed by Carranza. I offer all guarantees that the said Carranza Government has without conscience declared void. The Mexicans who are honorable and patriotic can come then to my side without fear, so that we may all unite and save the republic.

"The papers of Mexico and the United States recently published in sensational form the notice that I was asking for peace with Carranza. I declare emphatically that this notice is false. Furthermore, I will never ask of Carranza more than before. Patriotism and justice above all. Because of this I have striven and will strive without rest until I obtain it for all, whoever they may be, and above all my desire is to see the desert, the plains, and mountains rise with men tired of the infamy of Carranza and his ministry and, repeating history, rise up against the traitors and punish them as they deserve.

"During last July I made a statement, which appeared in the American papers, in which I invited General Francisco Murguia to personal combat on ground of his own choosing and to this day I have had no answer.

"I think the said General considers it beneath his dignity to accept the challenge, but the reason that guided me in my offer was to give him a chance to put an end to me as he had often boasted he would do if he could get his hands on me. I am still waiting for the acceptance of my challenge, because he will be convinced that the outcome of this meeting will be on the side of right and justice, which are my guides. He has said many times that I am fighting for fortune only, but I wish to make it public on this occasion that I have never fought for fortune's sake, and it is absurd and ridiculous to accuse me of it.

"I repeat that my strongest desires are and will be to make happy and to unite the people of my country."

Villa Cavalry on March.

A force of Villa cavalry was seen to leave Ojinaga today for the southwest, going in the direction of La Mula Pass. General Murguia is reported to be moving northeast to engage the Villa forces.

American troops watched the north bank of the Rio Grande, while Villa's cavalry patrolled the river on the Mexican bank in plain view of each other all night. On the mesa above the river the camp fires of the Villa troops in the town of Ojinaga could be seen plainly from Presidio.

Colonel Langhorne, commander of the American forces in the Big Bend district, this afternoon ordered all interned Mexican Federal soldiers, including General Espinosa y Cordova and his officers, taken to Marfa.

'FAUST' REVIVAL IS WELCOMED AT OPERA

Gounod's Masterpiece Is Given with Geraldine Farrar as Marguerite.

NIGHT BALLET A FEATURE

Thomas Chalmers Makes His Debut as Valentine—Pierre Monteux Conducts for First Time.

FAUST.—An opera in four acts and seven scenes (in French.) Book by Jules Barbier and Michel Carre. Music by Charles Gounod. At the Metropolitan Opera House.

Faust	Giovanni Martinelli
Mephistopheles	Leon Rothier
Valentin	Thomas Chalmers
Wagner	Louis D'Angelo
Marguerite	Geraldine Farrar
Siebel	Raymonde Delaunois
Marthe	Kathleen Howard

Conductor—Pierre Monteux.

"Faust" in these latter years has had a way of getting into the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House and out of it again; strange contrast to the years when it was a staple number of the repertory. So the replacement of Gounod's masterpiece in that repertory is now a subject for some operatic excitement.

Yesterday it was thus replaced for the first time in four years for the matinée audience, a large one, and there were various interesting details. There was the first appearance this season of Miss Geraldine Farrar; a new American baritone, Thomas Chalmers, took his place in the company for the first time, as Valentin; another American singer was in Marthe, Mme. Kathleen Howard; Mme. Raymonde Delaunois was allowed one of the most important opportunities that have been given her in the Metropolitan company as Siebel. The new French conductor, Pierre Monteux, conducted for the first time. And, perhaps not least, there was a new scenic setting by Joseph Urban.

The performance was an interesting one in many ways; it was not such a performance in the matter of singing of pure vocal beauty and vocal technique as they used to give at the Metropolitan Opera House in the good old days when the art of singing was in a better state than it is now. Miss Farrar's Marguerite is a well-known figure; it has much that is appealing and sympathetic, but vocally it was not so good yesterday afternoon as it has been in other years. Some may particularly have lamented her "Flower Song." Nor is Mr. Martinelli's Faust one that obscures any memories of Faust. It is a sincere and painstaking undertaking, but not inspiring. Mr. Martinelli's singing at the beginning was not of fine quality, but he bettered it considerably as the afternoon progressed. Mr. Rothier's Mephistopheles is a well-known and properly admired specimen of the true French style.

Mr. Chalmers did extremely well as Valentin. His experience gives him freedom and expressiveness upon the stage. He sang in excellent style, with a good French diction, and in a voice that showed power, excellent control, and good quality; a little metallic, but not in a way or to a degree that injures its value. Mme. Delaunois was a gallant Siebel, quite at home in the part, and singing with taste and skill.

Mr. Monteux conducted with skill and authority. He made it evident that he has ample knowledge of the score and control of the orchestra—an unmistakably rhythmic beat, a sense for dramatic values. The performance was kept from perfunctory lines. The chorus gave a good account of itself, except in the first part of the "Kermesse" scene of the first act, where there was unsteadiness.

The new scenic pictures are of remarkable beauty and effectiveness. Mr. Urban has not indulged much in the extravagances that some of his work has in the past shown; he has taken thought for historical accuracy, for atmosphere, for solidity of structure, for fine and harmonious color. The result is one of the best settings that the Metropolitan has had.

The performance included the "Walpurgis Night" ballet, which is not often given here. The scene was effective; the ballet perhaps a little sparse, but the dancing of Rosina Galli was [illegible].

The Metropolitan completed its opening week with Verdi's "La Traviata" in a special performance at popular prices last evening, when Frieda Hempel, already heard with Caruso on Thursday, returned to a favorite prima donna part as Violetta, the operatic Camille. Fernando Carpi, Italian lyric tenor, who joined the company last year, made his re-entrance in the congenial rôle of Alfredo, and Mr. De Luca, as Germont, sang the "Di Provenza" air. Mr. Moranzoni conducted.

A note of color was added to the performance by Mme. Hempel's striking red wig and by some gowns, not of Paris in the crinoline days, but modishly made this season in New York.

After the "Faust" matinée Director Gatti-Casazza and Conductor Monteux received a cable message sent by Mme. Gounod-Lassus from Paris in which the composer's daughter expressed her "warmest congratulations on the union, artistic and patriotic," of America and France.

It was announced that Bizet's "Carmen" will be performed for the first time this season at a special Thanksgiving Day matinee, Nov. 29, with Farrar and Martinelli, a new Micaela, May Peterson, and the baritone, Whitehill—an all-star cast, and all except one American.

RUSSIAN SYMPHONY PLAYS.

Conductor Altschuler Starts Series with Patriotic Program.

The Russian Symphony Society, now in its fifteenth season in New York, and playing music not in the repertory of other established bands, marked the start of its series at Carnegie Hall last night with a program including a new paraphrase of "The Allied Hymns" by Glazunow, to which Conductor Modest Altschuler had added the "Hymn of New Russia" and also America's anthem, quickly followed by "Dixie." A remarkable feature of the series was Glazunow's superb scoring of the hymn of Japan.

Before the patriotic group, Mr. Altschuler presented a symphonic poem, "Hyreus Nocturnus," by Vassilenko; an entire third act from the opera "Mlada," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; a "Dance of the Goat-Footed Sylvans," by Satz, and a pianoforte concerto No. 2, by Liapounow, with a Russian soloist, Tamara Lubimova.

Mme. Lubimova won applause by making a plucky finish after she and the orchestra had come to an awkward stop midway in the concerto.

Grainger Plays for Manassas School

Percy Grainger played for the benefit of the Manassas Industrial School of Virginia, his first recital of the season, in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. The pianist, now on furlough from his post as enlisted man in an army band, was heard in Bach's organ fantasia and fugue in G minor, arranged by Liszt; a Norwegian "Cattle Call" and folksong from the Valders district, harmonized by Grieg; Debussy's "Reflections in Water," Chopin's prelude and polonaise in A flat, and Schumann's sonata in G minor. In conclusion, he had Daniel Gregor Mason's "The Whippoorwill" and three of his own pieces, "One More Day, My John," a lullaby from "The Tribute to Foster," and a paraphrase on Tschaikowsky's "Flower Waltz."

Symphony Concert for Young People

The Symphony Concerts for Young People, a name that long since came to mean sold-out houses and an audience of all ages, for the concerts themselves are in the twentieth year, began with a gala event at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, introduced by "The Star-Spangled Banner" under Walter Damrosch's baton. A symphony of Mozart, No. 33, in D, headed the program, followed by "The Narrative of the Calendar Prince," or second movement from "Schéhérazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; the "Hungarian Fantasie" of Liszt for pianoforte, played by John Powell of Virginia, and the symphonic prelude, "Polonia," by Sir Edward Elgar. Mr. Damrosch's talk on the music and on patriotism as well found enthusiastic response from his hearers.

EX-CHIEF HOWE DIES; FAMOUS FIRE HERO

Winner of Ten Medals for Daring Rescues—Saved Fourteen Lives in Tenement Blaze.

Ex-Battalion Chief John P. Howe of the New York Fire Department, one of the most conspicuous heroes among New York's fire fighters until his retirement in January, 1914, having won ten medals for bravery and daring rescues, died yesterday at his home, 60 East Ninety-third Street.

Chief Howe joined the Fire Department as a probationary fireman in 1889, and when he retired he was the only man who had achieved the feat of having his name on the roll of meritorious service ten times. Howe entered the Fire Department with Chief William Guerin, and two weeks later, at a fire in an oleomargarine factory in East Forty-third Street, he had an opportunity to rescue Guerin, who was lost in [illegible] 1901 he [illegible] himself again by rescuing four firemen [illegible] company's [illegible] who were trapped by fire in a printing plant.

Perhaps the greatest rescue in point of numbers that Howe made was at a fire in Pearl Street, when he saved fourteen persons, one by one, within fifteen minutes. It was a tenement house blaze and the third floor of the building was a furnace. He was badly burned himself. Chief Howe commanded the battalion of New York fire fighters who went to the great Baltimore fire on Feb. 8, 1904.

MUNICIPAL MUSEUM OPENS.

Exhibits of All Departments Shown at City College.

The first municipal museum in the United States has just been established through the efforts of the College of the City of New York, co-operating with the various city departments. It is intended to act somewhat as an academic clearing house between the citizens of the city and those who govern it, supplying statistical data and general information to municipal employes and civic workers, and co-operating with real estate boards of trade, merchants' associations, bureaus of city inquiry, municipal research societies, and welfare leagues.

Models of new subways, ferry terminals, schoolhouses, playgrounds, municipal baths, &c., are shown. Five contrasting groups of beautiful models show new and old conditions on Randall's Island, the Municipal Lodging House as against a night scene in a public park, children's clearing bureau contrasted by the old-time orphanage, &c.

The Fire Department exhibits a model of one of its latest fireboats, a realistic exhibit of its new high-pressure service; the Police Department a model of its signal system in full operation. Other departments show models of bulkheads, bridge construction, and cross-sections of bridge cables. The Market Commission will show how it is reducing the high cost of living for the taxpayer.

THE PIANO PLAYED ITSELF.

Harold Bauer's "Duo-Art" Roll Interpreted with Orchestra.

The Aeolian Company made a unique demonstration last evening in Aeolian Hall of their "Duo-Art Piano," in which they had the assistance of the New York Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Walter Damrosch. The program contained orchestral pieces with a pianoforte concerto, accompanied by the orchestra. Only, instead of a pianist, the concerto was played by the automatic action of the Duo-Art roll in a grand piano. It was a reproduction of Mr. Harold Bauer's interpretation of Saint-Saëns's G minor concerto. Mr. Bauer himself was in Chicago. Mr. Damrosch followed it as he would a player of flesh and blood, and created some amusement by his occasional close scrutiny of the moving keys of the keyboard and his success in "coming out even" with the roll, after the pianist had had a pause which was filled in by the orchestra.

The orchestra began with the overture to "Oberon," and after the concerto two of Mr. Percy Grainger's folksong arrangements were played.

There was a remarkable audience present in which musicians and pianoforte makers were conspicuous. The achievement of the Duo-Art roll and the orchestra together—an achievement which is perhaps unique—aroused great interest.

Annual Sale of FURS

"GIMBELS—Furriers Since 1842."

Three great points stand out in this event above our former efforts. We believe the stocks are broader and more extensive than before—perhaps the largest in New York. We believe the values are rarely good, considering the steady advance in fur prices. And, we know we have made extraordinary preparations to make the occasion unusual. The fur section has been enlarged and beautified, and the whole event is one of uncommon interest and attraction.

We strongly urge the purchase of furs now, during this sale.

THRIFT AS WAR'S BY-PRODUCT.

The President writes to the Chairman of the War Savings Committee that he supposes we have, as a nation, wasted more than we are about to spend in the war, and that if the war teaches us thrift it will be worth the cost on a calculation of money alone. As we are spending billions, that sounds extravagant until two things are considered. War is temporary, and there is an end to its costs. Thrift is a matter of character, and descends from generation to generation. And the lesson of thrift is to be taught to so many millions that trifling sums saved by each of them make billions for all of them quickly. Already there are 10,000,000 bondholders among us. If the number should be doubled at the next loan offering, that would be smaller increase than from less than one in a hundred of us as investors to one in ten. When the savers run up to 20,000,000 or more, a mere $50 apiece gives a billion, and the saving of $50 shows how to save in larger sums.

It has been thought thrifty for children to put cents into a bank. But the cents in a bank are idle, and the cents put into war savings certificates will earn at the rate received and appreciated by millionaires. The sums saved are small individually, but they mean more even to the individual than the large total means to the nation. Good savers are careful spenders. That is where the thrift comes in. The saver of cents is a spender of dollars, and the spending will be grudged if it starves the saving.

The President confined his suggestion to money considerations because he was writing in connection with the war savings certificates, but it is possible to remark an added attraction in the sale of these certificates. Whoever holds them will be a better citizen, more appreciative of what the Government does for him and more zealous in its defense against attacks. Before the war we had been thinking more of profits than of savings, and had not been thinking enough of the Government. By turning our thoughts in another direction there are more by-products than the President mentioned, and their value is greater than that of the certificates which caused his remarks.

FINANCING THE LIBERTY LOAN.

The manner in which the Liberty Loan payments were managed on Thursday will prevent hereafter any repetition of the old slur that our banks and our bankers were unequal to the demands of international finance. If true when made, it has become untrue by the establishment of a system which made possible the smooth and easy performance of a task not surpassed in its magnitude or performance by anything ever done in London. That is all the more true and surprising because the United States stands alone, bearing the burdens of the Allies without such assistance as London has been able to command. The payments were $745,000,000 in this district. About half was arranged by crediting the Government and debiting the banks through the depositors. Less than $200,000,000 was paid by using the Treasury's certificates, and about $50,000,000 cash. When the smaller payments were made on the first Liberty Loan there was a flurry in the money market. On the second experience there was none, and it will be a surprise if there should be any hereafter without special cause.

The amount paid was so much larger than the amounts due that there is evidence of anticipation of payments by many, probably by more than a majority of subscribers. In the half year of war we have supplied the Government with more than an average of a billion dollars a month, and the first sign of exhaustion is yet to be shown. And, strange as it may seem, it is less likely to be shown as the loans increase. The reason for that is that the money is paid out nearly as fast as it is paid in. If [illegible] received by bank credits largely, but the payments are actual funds, totaling more than the nation's capacity of production, and with assurance of profit on all that is spent. The country asks nobody, neither worker nor capitalist, volunteers excepted, to do anything for nothing. The fact that the Government is buying more than can be produced appears from the universal demand for economy in superfluities. The capacity of production is not equal to the supply of both necessaries and extravagances, and necessities of persons and Government must both be supplied first.

There is in sight the biggest customer, with the best credit, that ever entered our markets. And yet there are pessimists at large. Even Germany's prosperity will outlast the war, and it is thought that we cannot do as well. This is a queer world, and Wall Street is a queer place. There will be losses due to the war, but there will be greater profits. There ought to be more bulls than bears of the right things, but there is a rush to exchange securities for cash, although the cash will buy less than the securities cost, and although the securities will command more goods hereafter as surely as peace is declared. The time to sell securities was long ago. Sellers now are those who neglected fair notice by the highest authority, and who did not see what was coming for themselves. They are going about blaming Wall Street, and neglecting opportunities to redeem their losses by making wise choices.

MR. BARNARD ANSWERS HIS CRITICS.

The Council of the National Academy of Design is the latest expert body to protest against the imposition upon London and Paris of replicas of Mr. GEORGE GREY BARNARD'S conception of LINCOLN. "To us," the Academicians say, "this presentation "does not convey the recognized "characteristics of LINCOLN." Neither does it to most laymen. Some time in '63 JOHN HAY went with Mr. LINCOLN to look at the statuary of the East pediment of the Capitol. "The President, with the eye of an "expert, objected to the statue of "'The Woodchopper,' by POWERS, 'as "'he did not make a sufficiently clean "'cut.'" Mr. LINCOLN knew how a woodchopper looked or should look. Most Americans know how LINCOLN looked, how he should look in a monumental effigy speaking truly the man and his character.

Yet there has been some little injustice done to Mr. BARNARD'S invention. Few can see it without recalling a line of a hymn that was a favorite with the Jubilee Singers:

Nobody knows what pain I feel.

If it's a denotation of physical, and not mental, pain that the statue seems to portray, yet by a remote association of ideas Mr. LINCOLN is recalled in one aspect of his achievement. The Jubilee Singers bring to mind emancipation and the Emancipator. This merit should not be forgotten or grudged.

Mr. BARNARD takes, of course, a different view. In this letter to THE TIMES he appears with a grandiosity not unworthy of his genius, of his long solitary thought, and of the form in which he has embodied it for the marvel of the world:

To the Editor of The New York Times:

These lines, my only answer, are worthy, I hope, to be placed on your editorial page:

"For he shall grow up before him "as a tender plant, and as a root out "of a dry ground: he hath no form "nor comeliness; and when we shall "see him, there is no beauty that we "should desire him.

"He is despised and rejected of "men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as "it were our faces from him; he was "despised, and we esteemed him not."
—Isaiah, liii.

GEORGE GREY BARNARD.

The comparison which Mr. BARNARD invites, his "answer" to the critics, is perhaps as bizarre and singular as they in their blindness to originality find his statue to be. ATHANASIUS against the world was not more loftily confident. Yet he seems to admit that there is no form or comeliness or beauty in his Lincoln. Seldom does the criticised agree so thoroughly with the critics.

TEACHERS WHO ARE NOT LOYAL.

Nearly two-thirds of the pupils in the city high schools are foreign by birth or the children of foreigners. In the very places where Americanization, the teaching and the learning of American democratic ideals, are most needed, instruction has been given far too often by the half-baked disciples of socialism, internationalism, pro-Germanism, the curse and paralysis of democracy abroad; and not in the high schools alone. The spirit of disorder, violence, anarchy was manifested in the municipal campaign by pupils of the high and other public schools. They rebelled, "struck," paraded, committed acts of violence, had their little hour of Bolshevism. These young Leninites are not to be blamed. What name is severe enough for their misleaders?

Insolence, revolt against the educational authorities, a selfish class spirit, have been but too common among many of the school teachers of New York. These old faults have been ascribed to politics, to favoritism, to imperfect supervision, to an unwieldy Board of Education. The new indiscipline is of a darker and more dangerous sort. We see teachers practicing or fomenting sedition and disloyalty, teachers who oppose the war, who don't believe in Liberty bonds. We [illegible] the Board of Education transferring, instead of dismissing, some of these disloyal teachers, giving them new subjects to infect. Mr. CHURCHILL is right there—they should be dismissed. No wonder the patriotic people in the districts to which the teachers have been assigned resent the transfer. We see two of the teachers suspended from that nursery of anti-patriotism, the De Witt Clinton High School, admitting that "the spirit of the Clinton "students is very free and in the "direction of open-minded liberal-"ism." We know what freedom and open-minded liberalism, what "democracy" and "radicalism" is meant. EMMA GOLDMAN, just out of jail, making use of her liberty to preach revolution and Russification, is an open-minded liberal. So is the young soap-box spouter, arrested on Thursday and again Friday, for denouncing the Government.

The spokesman of the Clintonian propagandists talks about "the be-"fuddling, irrelevant issues of pa-"triotism, loyalty, and Liberty "bonds," "the emotional mob spirit"; and tries to make out that the too long delayed punishment, feeble and almost ridiculous as yet, of seditionary teachers undermining the patriotism and perverting the political ideas of their pupils, is a brutality of officials against "democracy" and "free speech." The Teachers' Union, at a meeting held in the Washington Irving High School, another centre of wild-tongued socialism, voted to give the accused teachers its "legal, moral, and financial support." So it is the Union of the Teachers, of some teachers, that is, against the American Union.

What megalomaniac obsession possesses these or any other teachers? Do they imagine that a public school teacher is so lofty and sacred a character that he will not only be permitted but paid to strike at the hand that feeds him; more and worse than that, to strike at the heart of American democracy, to support the enemies of his country, if he acknowledge a country, to raise up a generation trained to imitate here the ignorances, follies, fanaticisms, and treacheries that have all but ruined Russia? Do they think that New York City is going to allow its public schools to be transformed into munition factories for the benefit of Germany?

Some of our teachers, it seems, were too mighty and aloof to take a loyalty pledge. Every man and every woman of them should be made to take such a pledge or be thrown out immediately upon refusal. It is unthinkable that treason and revolution or the coquetting of sappy minds with ideas destructive of the American State should be shielded, that the minds of thousands of children imperfectly acquainted with the American polity and exposed to influences unfriendly to it, should, in their most elastic and malleable stage, be poisoned with hideous errors and falsehoods such as are driving Russia toward the destruction of her democratic hope.

The Board of Education should root out all the disloyal or doubtful teachers. The little private war of these misguided or out-of-equilibrium persons on the United States must stop. They must be put out of the schools; and if they continue to profess sedition publicly, they must be locked up, for their own good, as well as that of the community, which, in the presence and the expectation of stern and tragical events, will not easily be patient with the foes in its own borders.

RAILROAD SERVICE.

Farmers in the West who complained to Senator BORAH because their crops had not been promptly carried to market should read the Interstate Commerce Commission's reports of railroad earnings and inquire about the work which the Railroad War Board is doing. Railroad figures for September were published a few days ago. They show a decrease of net earnings and an increase of nearly 20 per cent. in expenditures, although the companies were forced to economize in purchases. The same tendency is shown in figures for the nine months that ended with September. Since the beginning of the war, the cost of many things a railroad company must buy has been doubled, and wages have been increased.

The Railroad War Board on the 12th sent 1,500 cars southward to get lumber for the shipbuilders, 3,000 to the West for Government supplies, and as many refrigerator cars as could be found to the States where Senator BORAH heard complaints. There are not enough cars of this or any other kind. The board says so. In the use of those suitable for perishable food it has ordered the strictest economy. Each must have a full load, and the food must be taken out promptly at market terminals. The board, composed of competent railroad men, is doing all that can be done with an insufficient supply of carriers. Priority is given to transportation that is most needed; that which is not essential must wait. The strain upon service is without precedent.

What the railroads are doing should be appreciated by the American people. The companies should be heartily supported and encouraged. Such an increase of freight rates as the higher cost of supplies and labor justly requires should be permitted. Farmers who think their crops should be moved without delay must exert their influence in favor of rates which will enable the companies to buy cars. It is for the benefit of all that the railroads should be supported and kept in good physical and financial condition. So long as the war continues the demand for their service will grow.

NORWAY'S LOST SHIPS.

When the President of the Norway House, in debate a few days ago, was angrily complaining that the conditions imposed by our Government concerning exports of grain to his country were too severe, the report of his Government about the sinking of Norwegian ships had been in print for two weeks. There are two large volumes, in which Norwegians can read the record of their great losses and German submarine cruelty. Up to Oct. 1 the number of ships sunk was 660, their capacity having been 1,020,000 tons. With them were lost 713 men, and 17 more are missing. One-third of Norway's merchant tonnage has thus been destroyed. The Government shows that many sailors were murdered by gunfire while they were in lifeboats. Seven vessels were sent to the bottom "without trace," for the submarines killed all who were on board. This official report admits that German spies at Norway's ports sent word of sailings to the pirates waiting along the coast for their prey. Ships with cargoes for the suffering Belgians are in the list. Norway asks for our grain. Four of the lost vessels were carrying wheat to her from Argentina. Others that survive might now seek in that country what is needed, but probably the Germans would sink them.

In the debate at Norway's capital, the House leader insisted that his country must stand with Sweden and Denmark, even at the cost of starvation. Does Norway's agreement with them prevent emphatic official denunciation of Germany's pirates? This could not be found in the complaining note recently sent to Berlin. It is now said that a final decision about exports of food to the neutrals and the use of their ships has not been reached at Washington. Norway should have no American grain unless she promises to stop sending food to Germany, and nickel for torpedoes used in sinking our ships and her own.

THE LOST WEEK IN RUSSIA.

A little light is coming out of Petrograd; Bolsheviki light mostly, since they control the wires, but if we make the necessary reservations we can learn something of the situation. The reports brought to Stockholm by travelers, that KERENSKY had entered Petrograd, that the garrison was going over to him, and the rest of that crop, were what may be called El Paso news. KERENSKY advanced on Petrograd with a force said to have amounted to 5,000 men. There was fighting for two or three days at Gatchina. It ended on Monday with some sort of Bolsheviki victory, and TROTZKY, in a burst of delirious joy, issued a proclamation that "history would record the night of Nov. 12." But the Bolsheviki were still apprehensive, as is shown by a proclamation of Colonel MOURAVIEFF'S that filtered through into Sweden on Wednesday, in which he spoke of having "evacuated Gatchina in order to "avoid useless bloodshed and to take "a defensive position nearer Petro-"grad," and of being able to "resist forces ten times as strong as KERENSKY'S." A victor does not usually "evacuate" a captured city to avoid bloodshed and take up a "defensive position," nor does he speak of his ability to "resist" the defeated army.

KERENSKY, unless this proclamation of MOURAVIEFF'S was a forgery, still had the advantage in spite of his defeat; but within two days he is about to surrender, and to avoid it escapes in disguise. What happened? There are two things that afford a ground for conjecture. The reports of that "historic night" of TROTZKY'S describe it as if it had been a great battle, but all mention that "only a few" of the Bolsheviki forces were killed; they dwell on the number of wounded and on the number of the Cossacks' horses that they "toppled over." From their descriptions it is certain that the Cossacks made only one charge, and the language used indicates that the horsemen retired after the first volley. The other significant thing is General KRASNOFF'S account of his conversation with KERENSKY about surrender, in which the Premier charged him with treachery and alleged that the Cossacks were going to give KERENSKY up. KRASNOFF admitted the charges, according to his own story, and when he himself surrendered he was immediately released.

The "battle" at Gatchina, then, was no such great event as the excited TROTZKY imagined. Just as KORNILOFF'S forces melted away when he marched on Petrograd, so did KERENSKY'S, except that KORNILOFF was not deserted on any such large scale. The "battle" was not much more than a charge made for form's sake by the Cossacks. There were few casualties. KERENSKY'S men were already inclined to abandon him, and their commander, KRASNOFF, convinced them after the "battle" of Gatchina that this was the course to pursue.

KERENSKY evidently did not succeed in raising more than an insignificant number of the soldiers, and these were discontented with their rôle. As for the fighting in Moscow, that, like the fighting in Petrograd, was more street fighting between rival mobs.

What was the cause of KERENSKY'S utter failure? Apparently it was that his cause was his own and no other man's. By temporizing with the Bolsheviki he had alienated and disgusted all other factions. The latter, even the old aristocracy, are said to have joined with the Bolsheviki in putting an end to him, and though this would be incredible in any other country it is not incredible in Russia. A newspaper correspondent who has journeyed from the Caucasus to Petrograd reports that nowhere did he hear a friendly word for KERENSKY.

This, however, only scratches the surface of the situation. It was reported that the Cossacks had taken possession of Southern Russia and charged themselves with the duty of maintaining order there; and there is no information to the contrary from Petrograd. The fight between KERENSKY and the Bolsheviki seems to have been only a dismal comedy; but what is going on in Southern Russia? The same correspondent reports that he found everywhere a longing for some one who would restore order and really govern. Are the Cossacks, are the Chevaliers of St. George, preparing to step in? The news famine from Petrograd is eased a little, but still we hear nothing of KORNILOFF or KALEDINES, or of anything that happened more than a few miles from the capital. It is possible that KORNILOFF and KALEDINES, too, abandoned KERENSKY, or that they never were working with him at all; that they are concerning themselves with preparing to build up order in Russia, beginning with the south, and were not linking their labors to the doomed fortunes of the falling Premier. The Bolsheviki are still impossible, and the situation still calls loudly for a man.

ART NOTES.

First Exhibition of the League of Young Sculptors.

The first exhibition of the works of the American League of Young Sculptors is open at the Gorham Galleries. The exhibitors are a group of young men who have worked with prominent sculptors and recently have organized an association among themselves for exhibition and other collaborative purposes. Their work shows that they have something to say and know rather well how to say it. Olympio Brindisi has made a rabbit as compact as an Egyptian cat, and full of rabbit character, lacking only the snap that a sculptor perfectly certain of his powers would have been able to put into the tail or a single ear, perhaps. Erwin F. Frey's "Blue Dancer" is a fine performance, with movement and rhythm and a beautiful unity of line. There is humor in the feet of the figure designed for a door knocker by Edmond Quettrocchi, and "Seal at Leisure" by Emilio Angelo is a richly amusing bit of comment on animal nature. The portraits by Duane de Champlain are thoughtfully observed. Abraham Rosenstein does, perhaps, the most serious work of the exhibition in his "Truckman" and sketch for the theme "War Brides." Both figures show that the artist has studied and thought to much purpose and has followed in the footsteps of no one individual. The other exhibitors are Marius Azzi, Leo Bayman, Salvatore E. Fiorio, Anthony de Francisci, Karl H. Gruppe, Charles A. Hafner, George J. Lober, Harrison Meserole, James Novelli, Nathan Potter, and Vincent Salerno. The exhibition lasts until Dec. 1.

Stuart, Sully, and West.

At the Ehrich Galleries is an exhibition of paintings by Gilbert Stuart, Thomas Sully, and Benjamin West, constituting the third and last of their exhibition series of early American paintings. West was the master of Sully and Stuart, and the one picture by him is lent. It represents the artist painting a portrait of his wife and has not before been on exhibition in this country. The characterization is very fine and amazing enough to those who know West only by his historical pictures. There are eleven Sullys, the rather trying and elaborate "Christ Blessing Little Children" serving to show the direction in which the painter of torn hats most conspicuously failed. This is balanced by the charming portrait of the Sicard-David children, honeyed in color, and fair and limpid, just the sort of thing to establish a portrait painter in the hearts of his sitters and their families. Mr. and Mrs. Robert Johnson are more pungent performances, and there is an interesting copy of Stuart's "Miss Blodgett," which again shows the less gifted painter as missing the root of the matter and sadly blurring Stuart's clean precision of statement. The best of the eight Stuarts are perhaps the two portraits of Isaac Van der Beek and his wife, who was Rachael Ryerson, and sister of the great grandmother of Martin Ryerson, the American collector. These portraits are unusually firm and solid for Stuart's glancing brush and have a certain sturdiness of character in keeping with the brushwork. The exhibition lasts until Nov. 22.

A Lecture by Professor Osvald Siren.

Professor Osvald Siren will lecture in aid of the American National Red Cross on the paintings of the Italian Loan Exhibition, now open at 725 Fifth Avenue, and on paintings related to them. The lecture will take place in one of the rooms of the exhibition on Nov. 21, beginning at 8:30 P. M. The admission fee, which goes to the Red Cross, will be $3. The seating capacity will be limited to one hundred and twenty and early reservations are requested. Professor Siren contributes his services. The very large number of people interested in early Italian art will welcome the opportunity to hear so high an authority in this field with original pictures at hand for reference and comparison. The exhibition, which has already been noticed in these columns, contains important works from the collection of J. Pierpont Morgan, Otto H. Kahn, Dan Fellows Platt, Philip Lehman and many other prominent art collectors. Professor Siren was in this country two years ago to expertise the Jarves Collection at Yale University and is known here also by his valuable work on Leonardo da Vinci as well as by his contributions to such art periodicals as the Burlington Magazine and Art in America.

The Rumor Nuisance.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I am not a traveling man, but I have heard enough fake rumors right here in the metropolitan district to make the patriotic blood of any true American citizen boil with indignation, and I would like to add to Mr. Spargo's suggestion that if a "loyal legion" is formed it include every man and woman in these United States of loyal instincts.

THE PICKETS IN PRISON.

No Sympathy for Them Even Among Suffragists.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I want to voice my protest against such propaganda as has just been sent forth by members of the National Woman's Party, women who are sympathizers and supporters of the "pickets" recently arrested in Washington. Such women, and the women clamoring for peace—for peace when America must fight to the finish or return to the Dark Ages!—represent but a small part of the Suffrage Party. The majority combine ideals with big ideas, for they are of the larger vision who follow the Golden Rule, which alone dominates democracy.

The following extracts are from a letter signed by Lucy Burns, representing the National Woman's Party:

Miss Paul and Miss Winslow began a hunger strike last Tuesday to secure for their comrades treatment accorded political prisoners in every civilized country but our own. Even in prerevolutionary Russia the rights to buy paper and books, to receive mail, to buy food were given to men and women imprisoned for political activities. Prison officials directed by the Administration have been trying to break down Miss Paul's resistance by forcibly feeding her. It seems incredible that the authorities would go to that length rather than give honorable treatment to a woman. It ought to be a point of honor with the Administration to deal with them with the greatest consideration. Will you not protest against this barbarous treatment of a political offender?

They have been treated with the greatest consideration. Our President has been terribly burdened with momentous issues of war. The women who have hounded him have increased his burdens and have shown him none of the consideration which he has so lavished upon them during their campaign for votes. They are intelligent women, too. They have enjoyed to the full the advantages of an enlightened democracy. Is there, then, any excuse for the harm they have done and for incensing the loyal thinking public against a really splendid body of women whom they so unworthily represent?

As one of the ardent supporters of the suffrage cause and a member of the national party, I deplore the fact that when the day dawns for "Votes for Women" such women cannot be banished from the polls.

These women refer to Russia. They have long enjoyed the privileges of education and environment denied the Russians. In what strange manner, then, do they demonstrate their appreciation of their land of the free? America's really unselfish subjects are bleeding for the cause of justice above all else just now—the justice which these women are to enjoy—the justice which bespeaks a new day of freedom for all the world, the dawning of which their methods are postponing. By their self-centredness they are misguidedly injuring a cause intended for the development of broader laws for our beloved country.

German Methods in China.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Early in the Winter of 1913, accompanied by an artillery officer who served during the Boxer uprising, I visited the scene of some of the German looting in Peking. Although I learned rather in detail about the occasion, it did not begin to impress me as did looting of another sort then under way in the city of Tsinanfu. The hotel at which I stayed was on a German "concession." With its various unnecessary and unused buildings, it sprawled over at least twenty times as much land as was legitimately required.

The proprietor of the house, a German, unbosomed himself to the extent of saying that his was a dull and lonesome life. Having observed that he had practically no guests, I sympathized to the point of suggesting that business must be a problem for him here. "Oh, no! Not that! Not at all! But, of course, I could not stay here if the German Government did not pay me to do so. My country will one day be strong here, and we must hold all the land we can get."

Perhaps, in appearance at least, looting of that character is less repulsive than the other; but, when we consider all the facts, is it any more sportsmanlike or decent—or safe? The present seems to be a providential opportunity for certain people in South America to do some conclusive thinking upon that question.

The Mining Regiment.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have heard from different sources regarding a dispatch appearing in THE TIMES a week or two ago under a Washington date line and relating to the organization of a mining regiment by the Corps of Engineers for service abroad. The article conveyed the idea that the lame, the halt, and the blind went into its makeup. Nothing could be further from the facts. It is as fine a body of two-fisted, red-blooded, fighting Americans of the better sort as ever graced the uniform of the United States Army, volunteers every one of them. Athletes these, proud of their strength and of their ability to do; college men, engineers, miners from the hills of Arizona, Montana, and California, where the air is clear and bracing and the old American strain and spirit holds forth as it does in no other section—men trained to the minute, proud of their calling and proud and ready to fight, above ground or below, on the far-flung "first line" in France. No slackers these. We need and want more men of their kind.

BALLAD OF BROKEN THINGS.

The toy no skillful fingers may repair
Is dearer far in tearful childish eyes
Than all remaining treasures whole and fair,
For here is tragedy that beautifies.
The broken doll assumes heroic guise—
Puts on a halo and an angel's wings.
The saints must die before we canonize—
The broken things are the immortal things!

Yea, shattered gods the heart of man ensnare;
'Tis the scarred loveliness we praise and prize;
To wreck and ruin fealty we swear—
How near one's soul the Coliseum lies!
And see, ere straining flight may scale the skies,
Ere she may know her life's true wakenings,
From ashes must the fabled bird arise—
The broken things are the immortal things!

Ruin and dust and ashes of despair—
On these we build our shrines; and here our cries
Of adoration and exalted prayer,
Ascending like the smoke of sacrifice,
Halo waste lands and homes. On dying sighs
Are wafted seeds of perfect flowerings:
The Christ accepted death, and He was wise—
The broken things are the immortal things!

L'ENVOI

O Belgium! There is victory that dies,
Power that undermines the thrones of kings;
Fear not defeat; disaster glorifies—
The broken things are the immortal things!

THE CASE AGAINST PEACE "BY UNDERSTANDING."

A Belief That Germany Can Be and Should Be Defeated Based on Observations in That Country.

By JOHN R. KNIPFING,
Instructor in European History, Ohio State University.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Even the most cursory perusal of publications as heterogeneous as the German language press, the socialistic and the radically enlightened will convince the reader of their hearty accord on the question of peace; all three are agitating the discussion of an early negotiated peace. Their motives, however, in propagating this view are quite different. Publications of the first category probably see in this program the readiest salvation of Germany and the Germans. The Socialists are actuated primarily by their utopian idealism and the dread lest a continuance of the war may lead to the increased exploitation of the proletariat by the capitalistic interests. The radically enlightened, influenced no doubt by genuinely patriotic motives, have grounded their attitude not upon any academic defense of the constitutional right of freedom of public utterance, but solely upon the plea of national expediency.

This appeal, it seems, is based upon three fundamental assumptions. First, that it is impossible to effect the absolute military defeat of the Central Powers. Second, that a nation-wide discussion at the present moment of the specific terms upon which the United States might make peace "by understanding" would clarify our war aims, unify national sentiment and effort, and aid our Government in precluding serious political, economic, diplomatic, or military blunders. Third, that President Wilson's announcement that the United States will not make peace with the German Government as it is at present constituted is to be interpreted in the sense that any measures taken by the German people and providing for the immediate democratization of the Imperial German Government will remove every valid objection to a conference of American and German peace delegates for the purpose of terminating the war.

The pernicious consequences of spreading the belief that Germany cannot be decisively beaten on land and sea are patent to all. At home such an assumption would largely negative our tremendous military, naval, and economic preparations of today, for without a hearty co-operation of the nation's spiritual and intellectual forces with its physical and material efforts no war of any magnitude can be won. Abroad the effect would doubtless be an entirely unmanageable increase of dissaffection among the discontented elements of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia, and a remarkable strengthening of morale in Mitteleuropa. I believe, moreover, on the basis of my personal observations of German conditions, particularly economic and military, that such an assumption is fundamentally false.

During the past Winter in Germany I saw indications on every hand pointing to the gradual but increasing economic exhaustion of Germany. The food situation has reached the stage of serious privation, but not of actual starvation—it is but one of a host of contributing factors. Even more significant was the obvious deterioration of rolling stock and machinery, the great scarcity of leather, of woolen, cotton and linen wearing apparel, of copper, tin, lubricating oils, glycerin, and nitrates, and the coal shortage prevailing throughout Germany from the middle of January until March of this year. Furthermore, the depletion in numbers of Germany's total male fighting population seems to be proceeding slowly but surely. Last December I gathered first-hand information on the casualties suffered by the Bavarian villages of Volkach-am-Main and Kollitzheim. It showed that Volkach, with a population of 2,000, had lost thirty-eight dead (prisoners or missing not included) and Kollitzheim, with a population of 600, had fifteen dead between August, 1914, and December, 1916.

A nation-wide discussion of the definite terms on the basis of which the United States might be willing at the present time to make a negotiated peace with Germany would not be salutary in its effects on the nation's belligerent activities. Nor am I convinced that a nation at war will be considerably aided by the discussions on war aims of its publicists in avoiding political, economic, diplomatic or military blunders. The classic proof cited in support of this contention is that of the Paris Economic Conference, repudiated by President Wilson in his recent reply to Pope Benedict XV. I was in Italy when the discussion as to the feasibility of such an economic agreement was occupying the columns of the Italian press, and I then gained the distinct impression that it was precisely the force of Italian public opinion as expressed by the Roman and North Italian press which forced the hand of the Italian Government.

The view that a discussion at the present time of our war aims would promote the common weal rests upon the assumption either that our Government has not, up to now, outlined a sufficiently specific program for peace or that the conditions for peace actually proclaimed by the White House are impossible of fulfillment. Nothing, however, could have expressed more clearly our nation's war aims than President Wilson's declaration to the Pope that peace will come only when the German people shall demonstrate by a repudiation of the German Government as now constituted their sense of moral and international obligation. Publicists have failed for the most part in laying the emphasis of this condition where it properly belongs, with the German people and not with the German Government. It calls for a genuine change of heart on the part of the German people, no temporary and insincere makeshift in the formal constitution of the German Imperial Government. It calls for a complete renunciation by the Germans of their ruthless spirit of political aggressiveness.

Up to March of this year, certainly, I saw in Germany no indication of a change in this psychological state of aggressive nationalism. Had the German people been then requested to decide by referendum for or against territorial annexations and penalizing indemnities, probably 90 per cent. of the total male and female population would have voted in the affirmative. I heard Professors Heisenberg of Munich and Brandenburg of Leipsic address two large gatherings of National Liberals in Munich last Winter, the vast majority of whom approved with deafening applause the pleas of both speakers for territorial annexations at the expense of Belgium, Russia, Serbia, and Rumania, and for the speedy inauguration of the policy of ruthless submarine warfare. A round dozen table companions in my bourgeois Munich pension signified their unanimous approval of such a program. This aggressive political attitude I found coupled with a most intense spirit of bitterness toward America and the Americans, even before the fateful submarine blockade pronunciamento of the 1st of February. For example, at the opening of the Winter semester of the University of Munich in November last one of the professors refused to permit me to attend his seminary in Mediaeval History on the sole ground that I was an American. Again, during a visit last December to the Bavarian War Museum I noticed a shell fragment under exhibition in a large glass case in the main hall. A large placard identified the shell as one of American manufacture which had exploded at Lodsk on the Russian front in the Summer of 1915 among a group of German soldiers and seriously wounded several. My ears still tingle with indignation when I recall the execrations and maledictions pronounced by groups of museum visitors against "das geldsüchtige Amerika." After our break of diplomatic relations with Germany, on Feb. 3, it was not uncommon to hear in Munich and Berlin the expression: "Gott strafe England und der Teufel hole Amerika."

A peace negotiation in the immediate future with a people continuing in the possession of such a spirit of national aggressiveness and vindictiveness would in no wise reflect the motive which impelled us to enter this world struggle to make war upon war. As the situation now stands, such a withdrawal on our part from the war would be tantamount to a confession of national impotency, to a perversion for our future generations of our essentially peaceful pre-war institutions to the program of everlasting military preparedness and vast conscript armies. We are now in the war and we must see it through to a genuinely successful conclusion. Our end is the moral regeneration of the German people in their international dealings. The only means at present promising a due measure of success is that of carrying the fight to them until they shall be compelled by consulting their "Kriegskarte" to renounce the fight as a losing game, and in consequence to pledge themselves to reform their evil international ways. The stakes are big, but the reward is great, for we are struggling to safeguard the most precious contribution to progress of modern history. It was Ernest Renan, I believe, who once wrote (in his "Souvenirs d'enfance et de jeunesse") that the evolution of the human spirit is the best indication of modern progress, and that the recognition of the individual's rights to religious, civic, and political liberty is precisely the most singular manifestation of this spiritual development. Without national and international liberty, however, the rights of the individual cannot be safeguarded. The deduction follows that the United States in entering the war with such ideals has thereby announced to the world its disinterested concern for the security of human liberty and modern civilization.

From Thomas W. Churchill

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In your editorial of today you impute to me a readiness to discountenance sedition in the schools. Among the thirty-four members present, I voted for the suspension of the three teachers under definite charges. I voted alone against the transfer of the six teachers, because the penalty, if they were guiltless, was too heavy, and if they were guilty was too light.

Let me again make myself clear. No charges were made against the six teachers transferred. The President of the Board of Education and the Chairman of the High School Committee declared that the transfers were not based on any allegations savoring of disloyalty. The Associate Superintendent in charge of high schools indicated through suggestion and innuendo that the six teachers were tainted with "negative loyalty." Thus the unpatriotic quality of the six teachers was disclosed as the real motive for the transfers. I, therefore, opposed the transfers on the ground that, if the teachers disseminated treasonable theories or doubtful doctrines in one school, the evil was not corrected but aggravated by opportunity for dissemination in several schools.

I took the ground that disloyalty, active or otherwise, is too heinous an offense to be punished or cured by transfer. If any of the six teachers is disloyal or not loyal to the fullest measure that teacher should be dismissed. A transfer with such implications is tantamount to an accusation without opportunity to the accused to be heard.

You have seen fit to allude to me as a "Tammany educator," and to ask whether or not my vote might not "foreshadow the policy of Judge Hylan's Board of Education." Your slur is unworthy. Your apprehension predicated on my vote is groundless. I am no more a "Tammany educator" than I am a "Tammany parent," nor have I ever permitted politics to interfere with the fulfillment of the obligations of my oath as a member of the Board of Education. My vote was dictated solely by my individual sense of duty. I am alone responsible for it. It indicates no policy of the incoming board, for, as I have stated in public and in private, I can conceive of nothing that would warrant the ignoring of my many other obligations and changing my resolution to quit this alluring service at the expiration of my term of office on Dec. 31 next.

The Bad Effect of Mourning.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The interesting article in THE TIMES of Nov. 14, advocating the wearing of proper insignia, such as a gold star, rather than mourning as a result of casualties during the war, leads me to call to your attention a statement made by James W. Sullivan, a prominent member of the Typographical Union and assistant to Samuel Gompers, Chairman of the Committee on Labor of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense, at a meeting, June 28 last, in the Munsey Building, Washington, D. C. He said:

All France is in mourning. It is not only a depressing sight, but it is a great tax upon the people. If the French had, at the beginning of the war, declined to wear mourning for the dead, the poor would have saved tens of millions of dollars. In France, a wife with three children not only puts mourning on herself, but has them don it. I know of one case where a great sacrifice was made, even to the limitation of diet, to make this change in dress. Not only would it be as depressing here as in France to view a large number of black clad women and families, but it would give the German sympathizers one more reason to picture the gloomy aspect of war. The natural thing would be to wear a band of black upon the sleeve. If we are in for a two or three years' war, it is worth considering.

Mr. Sullivan spent considerable time in France and Italy before coming back to this country in April and speaks from personal knowledge of the effect of wearing mourning. While he dreads the horrors of war as much as any extreme pacifist, he is first a loyal American citizen, and would have inaugurated every possible effort in the interest of the defense of the United States, but believes that steps should be taken to prevent unnecessary gloom and discouragement. The psychological effect upon the American soldiers in Paris, according to recent accounts, is bad.

MISS OCHS WEDS LIEUT. SULZBERGER

Quiet Home Wedding—Bride Is Daughter of Publisher of The Times.

WILL LIVE AT SPARTANBURG

Bridegroom Is Stationed at Camp Wadsworth—Leave for South After Ceremony.

The wedding of Miss Iphigene Bertha Ochs, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Adolph S. Ochs, and Lieutenant Arthur Hays Sulzberger, was solemnized at 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon at the residence of the bride's parents, 308 West Seventy-fifth Street.

The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Dr. Joseph Silverman of Temple Emanu-El, in the presence of the near relatives of the bride and bridegroom and intimate friends. The floral decorations of the house were roses and chrysanthemums.

The bride, whose father gave her in marriage, wore a gown of ivory satin and silver brocade, the brocade forming the bodice and a deep girdle effect, the skirt having satin panels. The train, depending from the shoulders, was made of tulle and old point de Brussels lace which belonged to the bride's mother.

The veil of tulle was caught up by a narrow bandeau of orange blossoms worn at the back of the coiffure, and enveloped the figure in voluminous folds, falling over the face. The bride's only ornament was a pearl necklace, the gift of her parents. She carried a bouquet of white orchids and lilies of the valley.

Miss Ursula Squier, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. J. Bentley Squier, was the bridesmaid. She was gowned in pale pink and blue chiffon, with a picture hat, and carried a bouquet of pink roses.

The pages, both 4 years old, were Master John Bertram Oakes, cousin of the bride, and Master Cyrus Leo Sulzberger, a nephew of the bridegroom. They appeared in sailor suits.

Captain Julius Ochs Adler, U. S. O. R. C., the bride's cousin, was best man for Lieutenant Sulzberger. Both wore their service uniforms, with sabres.

The ushers were David M. Heyman, Edward S. Greenbaum, Leo Sulzberger, and David Hays Sulzberger.

Mrs. Ochs, the bride's mother, wore a Princess gown of mastic velvet embroidered in a design of dull silver. The mother of the bridegroom, Mrs. Sulzberger, wore a gown of blue and gray chiffon.

After the ceremony Lieutenant Sulzberger and his bride left for a trip through the South before going to Spartanburg, S. C., where Mr. Sulzberger will resume his duties at Camp Wadsworth on Nov. 25, being Second Lieutenant, Field Artillery, Officers' Reserve Corps, U. S. A.

The bride's going-away gown was made of military blue duvetyn, trimmed with seal, with a toque and muff to match. She is the only child of the publisher of THE NEW YORK TIMES, and is a member of the Board of Directors of The New York Times Company, and of the Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times Company. She is a graduate of Barnard College, class of '14, and has taken an active part in the work of several charitable associations.

Lieutenant Sulzberger is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus L. Sulzberger of 516 West End Avenue, and was graduated from Columbia University, class of '13. He is a member of the Sons of the American Revolution, and is a great-great-grandson of Lieutenant Benjamin Mendes Seixas of the Continental Army of the American Revolution. He has been active in communal work, and for a time was President of the Jewish Big Brother Association.

ENGAGEMENTS.

Mrs. George J. Helmer of Nyack, N. Y., has announced the engagement of her daughter, Miss May Helmer, to Arthur Currie Tucker of this city, son of the late Arthur C. Tucker and a grandson of George Washington Tucker. Miss Helmer was graduated from Vassar, class of '15. Mr. Tucker is now at Camp Wadsworth.

Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Griffiths of Westfield, N. J., have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Helen Louise Griffiths, to J. Edward Atkins, also of Westfield. Mr. Atkins is serving in the Mine Sweeping Division of the United States Naval Reserve Force.

Mr. and Mrs. Willard P. Davenport of Glen Ridge, N. J., have told of the betrothal of their daughter, Miss Mildred Davenport, to Lieutenant Frank L. Walton of Springfield, N. J.

Mr. and Mrs. John G. Campbell of St. James School, Maryland, announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Margaret Dunscombe de Rougé, to Lieutenant Thomas Wolcott Little, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Little of Hartford, Conn.

The engagement of Miss Alma Townsend Coons, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward T. Coons of Montclair, N. J., to James Redman Munoz, was announced during the week at a luncheon given by Miss Isabel Munoz at Sherry's. Mr. Munoz is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Sigmona C. Munoz of New York.

Wedding Notes.

Miss Louise Dickinson, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Gordon K. Dickinson of Jersey City, and Edward F. Swenson of Albany will be married in St. Thomas's Church, this city, on Dec. 8, at 4 o'clock, with a reception following at the Hotel Gotham.

The marriage of Miss Anna Hammer, daughter of Mrs. Pauline Hammer, and Samuel B. Mandel, both of Brooklyn, will take place today at noon in the yacht room of the Hotel Astor.

Mrs. Charles Harmon Paddock of this city announces the marriage of her daughter, Miss Harriet Sibley Paddock, to Leo Alexander, which took place on Nov. 14 in New York.

CAMP LIFE AT HIPPODROME.

Men of the National Army Will Be the Actors.

Life at Camp Upton as it is today will be shown at afternoon and evening performances at the Hippodrome on Sunday, Dec. 9, the men of the 305th Regiment, now in training at the camp, being the actors of the various scenes. According to an advance statement, spectators will be able to see just how the men live in camp, what they do by way of work and play, and what kind of men make up the rank and file of the new national army.

The first scene will show a body of men at Fourteenth Street and Broadway on their way to the camp before undergoing training. The same men at camp, tumbling from their barracks to respond to reveille, will be in the next scene. Then will come drill, and after it a camp-fire scene outside the barracks in the evening. In this will be introduced the regiment's talent, which is said to be noteworthy. There will be singing, gymnastic stunts, instrumental music and recitations. The music of the show will be furnished by the regiment's band.

The purpose of the two performances is to raise money for a regimental assembly hall. Owing to the demand upon the recreation and assembly quarters provided by the Y. M. C. A. and the Knights of Columbus, the men of the 305th Regiment recently expressed a desire to have their own hall, and their Commander, Colonel W. R. Smedberg, Jr., after consultation with Lieutenant James E. Schuyler of Company I, agreed to the Hippodrome show. The sale of tickets for either performance will begin at the Hippodrome next Wednesday, and applications for seats can be sent to Lieutenant Colonel James C. Rhea, 305th Regiment, Camp Upton.

McADOO GRANTS EXTENSION

Prolongs Time for Filing of Certain Income Tax Returns.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—Secretary McAdoo today approved an extension of the time in which to file returns of income by nonresident alien individuals and corporations and American citizens residing or traveling abroad until ninety days after the end of the war. The announcement of this action follows:

"The provisions of TD 2443, Feb. 12, 1917, (from time to time amplified and extended to include Nov. 1, 1917,) granting to nonresident alien individuals and corporations and American citizens residing abroad who because of war conditions may not have been able to file their returns of income for 1916, are hereby amended so as to extend the time in which returns for 1916 and subsequent years may be filed, for such period as may be necessary to and including ninety days after the proclamation of the President of the United States announcing the close of the war with Germany.

"In all such cases there is required to be attached to the return an affidavit stating the cause or causes of delay in filing returns of income within the time required by law, in order that, upon the showing made, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may determine whether the failure to file returns in time was due to a reasonable cause and not to willful neglect. When the showing justifies a conclusion that the failure to file returns in time is excusable, no penalty by way of addition to tax will be imposed."

The "Walpurgis Night" Ballet.

Gounod's "Faust," in the current Metropolitan revival, restores Goethe's episode of the Walpurgis night revels, always included a generation ago, when "Faust" was sung in German. On Jan. 20, 1886, the ballet was danced in a performance at which Lilli Lehmann sang as Gretchen, Emil Fischer as Mephistopheles, and Herr Stritt as Faust, the title rôle being later taken by Max Alvary.

About the same time, in 1886, when Mrs. Thurber's American company was at the old Academy of Music, there was an elaborate production of the "Faust" ballet, with distinguished solo dancers, conducted by Theodore Thomas.

The scenery and staging of the Walpurgis night in the old Metropolitan production were classical in design, with a large Grecian temple in the background, much resembling the Night of the Classical Sabbath in Boïto's "Mefistofele." This, of course, was in marked contrast with Sir Henry Irving's mounting of the same scene in the dramatic version of "Faust."

RODIN, FAMOUS SCULPTOR, DEAD

Frenchman Distinguished for His Realism Dies at His Villa Near Paris at 77.

FOUGHT CRITICS 50 YEARS

His "La France" Presented by France to America—"The Thinker" in Metropolitan Museum.

PARIS, Nov. 17.—Auguste Rodin, the famous sculptor, died in his villa at Meudon, in the outskirts of Paris, after an illness of a few days.

Had he lived, M. Rodin would have been elected a member of the Academy of Fine Arts by almost a unanimous vote a week from today.

Paul Laurens, the painter, said of Auguste Rodin: "He belongs to the race of those men who march alone."

And for most of the seventy-seven years of his life the great sculptor marched alone, first battling his way against the adversities of relentless poverty and hostile criticism and, in the latter years of his life, alone at the head of an international army of enthusiastic admirers.

When Rodin presented one of his early pieces to the Academy of Fine Arts he was told that his work did not "exhibit any evidence of talent," and some fifty years or so later critics in many places were hailing him as the greatest sculptor of the world—save Michael Angelo—since Pheidias and Praxiteles. He faced starvation in his youth because he could not sell his statues, and in October, 1916, the French Chamber of Deputies accepted his gift of his works and art collections, valued at $400,000, and gave him for life the use of the Biron mansion in Paris, which became known through the Parliamentary act as the Rodin Museum.

François Auguste Rodin was born in Paris on Nov. 12, 1840, of wretchedly poor parents. He entered a free drawing school in the Latin Quarter at the age of 14 and, after several years of study, made a model in clay of one of his companions, with which he tried to win entrance to the Academy of Fine Arts. He failed. Some time later he tried again, and again was denied. A third attempt resulted in the third failure.

His First Masterpiece.

Rodin was not discouraged by his failures at the Academy of Fine Arts. He had no means, and was obliged to consort with the very poorest in Paris, yet he struggled on and submitted his work at every public examination that was held, always without success. Fortunately he came at last under the notice of Barye, the painter and sculptor of animals, who carried his artistic education to the point from which Rodin could pursue it alone. At the age of 23, before embarking on a determined struggle to fame and fortune, the future sculptor married. This move served as an incentive, and spurred him on in his task, for in less than twelve months he had produced his first masterpiece, entitled "L'homme au nez cassé." This was submitted to the judges at the Salon in 1864 and promptly refused; he took it home and treasured it carefully. One of his first cares when, in after years his countrymen had recognized his talent, was to have this bust cast in bronze, in which form it crossed the Channel, and was shown at the Grosvenor Gallery in 1881.

After the Franco-German war, during which he was forced to endure the siege of Paris, Rodin migrated to Brussels, where he executed a great deal of work, besides sending two busts to the Paris Salon; both were accepted, and were placed on exhibition in 1875. Two years later the master was further recognized with the "Age d'Airain," or "Primeval Man," which represents one of the first inhabitants of our world, physically perfect, but in the infancy of comprehension. The claims of this amazing statue could not be overlooked by the Salon committee when Rodin brought the work to Paris. So realistic, indeed, was it, that some of the sculptor's critics hinted that the figure must have been molded from the living model.

He Aimed for Realism.

But Rodin was not yet free from harsh criticism and ridicule. The school of orthodoxy in sculpture was as hostile to him as were the orthodox musicians to Wagner. Rodin did not idealize his subjects, but aimed for realism, going to nature for his inspiration. To him all nature was life, and life was art. He saw in the shaking form of an old man or woman, with bowed head and bent and twisted limbs, something as worthy of artistic expression as a Venus or Apollo. And he was a worker in mass, producing his subjects in detail only so far as would bring out his dominating conception. His work, therefore, had less of finished form than that of the conventional artists, and his recognition by them was, therefore, delayed until by the very power of his work he forced himself upon them.

Even after he had won fame Rodin's work was sometimes ridiculed. His statue of Balzac, for example, was received with jest and gibe. It was an extraordinary and unconventional conception of the great novelist, which Rodin executed upon commission from the Society of Men of Letters. The Parisian public became so worked up over the merits of the monument that the controversy for the time eclipsed interest even in the sensational Dreyfus trial. Balzac was represented in a voluminous dressing gown, the features and figure roughly sketched. Critics exclaimed that it was "an enormous porpoise standing upright, draped in a thick bath wrapper." They called it grotesque, huge, and flippant; while, on the other side, there were those who saw in it "the incarnation of the great writer's soul." The society which had ordered it, however, held the majority view that the work was incomprehensible, if not ridiculous, and it gave the commission to the sculptor Falguière, who executed a more conventional work in the following year.

Rodin's Victor Hugo was received with more appreciation, and by many is considered one of his masterpieces.

A Tireless Worker.

The sculptor was a tireless worker, the quantity of his work being as amazing as its quality. His greatest output in one year was in 1889. No less than thirty-one pieces of sculpture were put on view at the Georges Petit Gallery in that year, among them being some of the best of Rodin's life-work, such as "Ugolino," "The Danaïd," "The Thinker," "Bastien Lepage," and "The Bourgeois of Calais." For quality, quantity, and quickness the production was unique.

For years after the Balzac controversy Rodin devoted himself to a great decorative composition some twenty feet high, "The Portal of Hell," for the Museum of Decorative Arts. This work was inspired mainly by Dante's Inferno, the poet himself being seated at the top, while at his feet is the writhing of passion and anguish of despair. The figure of "The Thinker," which is one of Rodin's best-known works in America, has been exhibited in cast for several years at the Metropolitan Museum of Fine Arts in New York, and at various other places. It is one of the figures designed for this titanic representation of "The Portal of Hell."

His Bust of "La France."

A bronze bust of "La France" by Rodin was presented to the United States by the people of France during the tercentenary celebration of the discovery of Lake Champlain, and has since been mounted on a monument to Champlain at Crown Point, N. Y. In addition M. Rodin had executed busts for a number of wealthy Americans, and the Metropolitan Museum of Art, through a gift of $25,000 by Thomas Fortune Ryan, has obtained the largest single collection of the works of Rodin outside the artist's own studios. There are forty examples of his works in the New York Museum.

Rodin in his later life received many honors. Upon the death of Whistler he succeeded as President of the International Society of Painters, Sculptors, and Gravers. Early in the European war he sent a collection of his works to England as a token of admiration of the British troops, and later he executed a deed of gift to the French Government of the entire collection of his own works, other art objects he had acquired, and the Hotel Biron in which they were assembled for a museum.

Rodin's drawings are almost as wonderful as his sculptor work. A valuable album containing over a hundred plates, with an aggregate of 142 drawings, was published some years ago by Messrs. Goupil. In more recent times the experiments made by the great sculptor with his pencil were on behalf of personal friends. He illustrated Bergerat's "Engherrande," Octave Mirabeau's "Jardin des Supplices," and ornamented a copy of Baudelaire's "Fleurs de Mal."

DENIES RELIGIOUS CHARTER.

Court Objects to Mixture of Business and Benevolence.

Supreme Court Justice Donnelly refused yesterday to approve the incorporation of the Ancient and Mystical Order of Rosae Crucis, Supreme Grand Lodge of North America, because, he said, the petition indicated that the purpose was a mixture of business and benevolence. The petition said that one of the purposes was "to unite in one body all men and women 21 years old or over who seek to study under efficient and proper guidance a definite and proscribed course in the analysis of all ancient, mediaeval and modern religious philosophy and moral codes, with correlated facts revealed in discoveries made in the various fields of arts and science."

The organization also plans "to summarize and compile for these analytical studies a religious, scientific philosophy and course of living which will attune the mind and consciousness of man with the divine mind of God, and likewise attune the natural forces of the body with the creative and constructive forces of the universe, so that those who study with us may enjoy a life of sacredness, happiness, and health." The petition stated that the organization intended to sell costumes and emblems, and for this reason the Court decided that it ought to be organized as a business instead of as a membership corporation.

SUES FOR $200,000 ESTATE.

Adopted Daughter Asserts W. H. Brown Made Promise to Her.

Mrs. Florence B. Ennis, adopted daughter of William H. Brown, who died on April 24 last and cut her off in his will on the ground that her foster mother had provided for her and that she had married without his consent, filed suit in the Supreme Court yesterday to be declared the sole heir to his $200,000 estate.

Mrs. Ennis, who is the wife of John M. Ennis, a bond dealer, alleges that when the decedent and his wife, Mrs. Charlotte Brown adopted her in 1890, when she was 7 years old, they both promised her father, Macdowel Cugle, that they would make her their heir. She said that after she became of age in 1914 they repeated this agreement in a formal adoption paper, and that when Mrs. Brown died in October, 1915, she inherited the entire estate. She alleges that after she married Mr. Ennis in April, 1916, she and her husband lived with her foster father, but that in October of that year he tried to induce her to abandon her husband by promising to give her all his property if she did so, and threatening to cut her off if she didn't. She refused to leave her husband and as a result was cut off in the will.

Mrs. Ennis names as defendant Howard Chichester, partner of her foster father in W. H. Brown & Co., exporters, and W. H. Brown & Chichester, manufacturers of combs, who receives $50,000 under the will. The testator gave $10,000 each to the Home of the Annunciation and the Free Industrial Home for Crippled Children, and $1,000 to the Church of the Transfiguration. He left $5,000 to be distributed among his employes.

If only Someone would tell him about Sanatogen

THE chances are someone will tell him about the mighty health- and strength-promoting powers of Sanatogen—how it re-energizes the nerves, how it improves digestion, how, by giving fresh tone to the entire system, it will enable him once more to perform his arduous duties without fear of nervous breakdown.

Everywhere, men and women who are compelled to overwork find in Sanatogen a wonderful source of renewed strength and endurance.

Let this be a message of cheer to YOU. When excessive effort has sapped your vitality—don't get merely "some tonic." Get the one tonic constructed on scientific principles, the tonic that has the endorsement of the medical profession and the world's leading thinkers, the food-tonic, Sanatogen.

Sir Gilbert Parker, M. P., the novelist-statesman, writes: "Sanatogen is to my mind a true food-tonic, feeding the nerves, increasing the energy, and giving fresh vigor to the overworked body and mind."

John Burroughs, the famous naturalist, writes: "Sanatogen did me much good—it gave me strength, steadied my nerves and greatly improved my sleep."

Lady Henry Somerset, the English social reform advocate, says: "Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep, invigorates the nerves, restores the patient to health."

SEND FOR "The Art of Living"—a booklet by Richard Le Gallienne, the popular poet-author, touching on Sanatogen's kindly help and giving other interesting aids in the quest for contentment and better health. This book is FREE. Address THE BAUER CHEMICAL CO., INC., 28 Irving Place, New York.

EXPECT 'HERO LAND' TO YIELD A MILLION

Great Interest in Big War Relief Bazaar to Open Here Next Saturday.

EXPENSES ALREADY MET

Variety of Entertainment Assured for Nearly Four Weeks in Which Fair Will Run.

"Hero Land," the most elaborate war relief bazaar ever held in this country, will be opened at 7 o'clock next Saturday night. Practically every large war relief organization in the country will be represented.

Nearly every man and woman of prominence in this city has taken a direct interest in the bazaar, which is expected to bring in more than $1,000,000. Leaders in society, business and professional life have given much of their time toward planning and building the great spectacle. Many prominent artists have had charge of the construction of impressive and minutely realistic scenes of the battlefront, and they have been assisted by an army of architects, builders, scene painters, stage managers, interior decorators, carpenters, and electricians.

Each of the one hundred national war relief organizations which are taking part in "Hero Land" is carrying out its own plans for its share of the entertainment, and these plans are as numerous as the organizations themselves, so that a great variety of entertainments will be provided. This has been made possible at the least possible expense by the donation of the services of some of the best artists and executives in the country. The expenses have already been met, and every cent received will go direct for war relief. John Moffatt, Executive Chairman of the Management Committee, said yesterday:

"We have no promotion expenses. None of the members of the Management Committee will receive any compensation for their services. Our only expenses are concerned with rental, decorations and the salaries of stenographers and others engaged in clerical work. Money has been privately donated for the expense of getting advertising for the program. All expenses have already been met by the advance sale of entrance tickets."

Allies to be Represented.

The opening night, Saturday, Nov. 24, will be American Night. Many distinguished persons in official and unofficial life in America will be present, and all the Governments of the Allies will be represented. "Hero Land" will not be open on Sundays. The bazaar will continue until Dec. 12. The program for the first week is described as follows in a statement by the Management Committee:

Monday, Nov. 26, will be French and Alsace-Lorraine Day, with French and Alsatian plays and spectacles, exclusive French official motion pictures of the war, and the attendance of distinguished visiting Frenchmen.

Tuesday, Nov. 27, will be British Day, with a showing of special British war films and a dramatic performance by noted British actors and actresses now in America. In the evening there will be a sports night, under the direction of the sporting editors and writers of the New York papers, and as features of which will be boxing bouts between men of the army and navy and between British and Canadian soldiers, together with fencing, wrestling, bayonetting exhibits, and every conceivable game of interest to sportsmen.

Jewish War Relief Day will be celebrated on Wednesday, Nov 28, by the Joint Distribution Committee of the American Fund for Jewish War Sufferers, which has taken charge of the entire program for that day, under Felix M. Warburg, Chairman of the Committee, and Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Chairman of the Hero Land Committee. Mrs. Jacob H. Schiff is Chairman of the committee in charge of the entertainments, assisted by Mrs. L. N. Spiegelberg. Viscount Reading has accepted an invitation to be the guest of honor on Jewish War Relief Day, and the program will include an elaborate spectacle, with dances and anthems of the allied nations, together with a program in which noted professional artists are co-operating.

On Thanksgiving, United States Navy Day will be celebrated under the patronage of Secretary of the Navy Daniels and Admiral Nathaniel R. Usher of the New York Navy Yard. The enlisted men and officers of the navy have a prominent part in the program, and in the evening there will be held the famous "Sixty Club" ball.

On Friday, the 30th, there will be Stage Night, and Saturday, Dec. 1, will be Italian Day, with features arranged by the Italian Red Cross and the Italian War Relief Committee. Mme. G. E. Poccardi, wife of the Italian Consul General, and Count Macchi de Cellere, the Italian Ambassador to the United States, will serve as patrons.

To Show German Airplane.

A few of the features of the bazaar will be a German airplane brought down by Guynemer, the British tank which stood for a few days in Central Park, French official war motion pictures, an authoritative account of the battles of the Marne and Verdun by M. Courtellement, illustrated by color photographs and indorsed by Generals Joffre and Haig.

Belgian goods will be sold among skillfully executed Flemish scenes by débutantes working for the Aid for Destitute Belgian Women and Children and Disabled Belgian Soldiers. Mrs. Pierre Mali, wife of the Belgian Consul, will be the Chairman of the booth. This organization acknowledges the following donations received so far:

WAR TAX CONFERENCE ON.

Business Men at Washington to Learn How Law Is Applied.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—On account of complications incident to the execution of the new war tax law, Internal Revenue Commissioner Roper called a conference, which began here today, of representatives of the trade organizations, Stock Exchanges, Produce Exchanges and similar organizations for an extended discussion of the law and its administration. The aim is to make clear what the various taxes on business are and how they are to be construed to apply, and to set forth the methods proposed to be employed for their collection.

The operation of the law will be rendered more effective and easier of accomplishment, it is believed, after the business men of the country have had an opportunity to exchange views with the Government officials.

The conference began with a limited number of representative business men present. Sessions will be continued next week, and a large attendance is expected. Among those who were in the conference today were Samuel F. Streit, Chairman Clearing House Committee of the New York Stock Exchange; George M. Shutts, President New York Cotton Exchange; Walter L. Johnson, Vice President New York Cotton Exchange; Fred C. Vincent, representative Kansas City Board of Trade; G. E. Saunders, representative Chicago Board of Trade, and Adolph Kemper, A. V. Booth, A. F. Lindley, and George A. Rich, representing the Chicago Board of Trade.

ARMY AND NAVY NOTES.

Capt. H. S. Rowland, U. S. A., Assistant Chief of Staff of the 89th Division of the National Army, at Camp Funston, Kan., announces that Major Gen. Leonard Wood, the division commander, has asked the composers and musicians of the seven States from which the personnel of the division is drawn, to take part in a competition for the composition of an official march for the divisional command.

"It is desired," says Captain Rowland, "that composers keep in mind the history of the seven States—Missouri, Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Arizona, New Mexico, and South Dakota—from which the men of the 89th Division come. The music should be symbolical of their history from the days of the early settlement of these States, the struggles of the pioneers, their battles with Indians, and the gradual rise of these seven commonwealths to the important rôle they play today as the great Middle Western States of America.

"It is possible to weave into each composition melodies reminiscent of Indian music, of the days of the great ranches and cow punchers, of the stage coaches, pony express and wagon trains, melodies that are reminiscent of the plains, the mountains, the rivers, villages, towns, and cities of the Middle West."

Capt. John H. Gibbons, U. S. N., former superintendent of the Naval Academy, who commanded the dreadnought Utah during the taking of Vera Cruz in April, 1914, has been appointed Naval Attaché of the American Embassy at Buenos Aires. Captain Gibbons is also a former attaché of the Embassy in London.

Lieut. Col. Edgar T. Collins, known to Plattsburgers of the 1916 camps as the commander of the New York City regiment, is Chief of Staff of the National Army Division at Camp Dix, N. J. Colonel Collins was an aide on the staff of the late Lieut. Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, during the international crisis in China which followed the Boxer outbreaks in 1900.

Major Gen. C. C. Ballou, National Army, who is to command the Ninety-second Division of the National Army, which is to be composed entirely of negro troops, is a native of New York and a graduate of West Point of the class of 1888. He is 55 years of age and still has nine years of active service ahead of him. The colonels who will command the infantry regiments in the negro division, all of them West Pointers, are: Vernon A. Caldwell, Ross L. Bush, James A. Moss and W. P. Jackson. The artillery commanders will be Colonels Daniel T. Moore, Frederick T. Austin and William E. Cole.

The Army and Navy Journal states that the depot quartermaster at Chicago has been authorized to ask sealed proposals for the delivery of 10,000 standard bicycles to be used by army messengers and couriers. Each bicycle is to be equipped with an attachment in which the rider's rifle may be carried, consisting of two supports holding the gun parallel to the frame. These supports must be so designed as to permit the easy removal of the weapon. Specifications sent out "a possible bidders call for a "well-balanced design." Each machine must be of construction sturdy enough to insure its supporting around 250 pounds, as the average equipment of the rider will weigh at least fifty pounds.

Major Gen. George Barnett, commandant of the United States Marine Corps, will complete his five years' tour as the marine commander next February. Whether General Barnett will be redetailed to command the corps for another five years is a matter to be decided by Secretary Daniels. Secretary Daniels's policy has been not to recommend the details of officers who have completed a full tour of duty as bureau chiefs, or in other similar capacities. There is an impression that General Barnett, during whose administration the Marine Corps has been increased from 10,000 to 30,000 men, may prove to be an exception to the rule.

"A proposition is under consideration," says The Army and Navy Register of Washington, "to make a slight change in the insignia of commissioned officers of the army in order, primarily, to better identify the rank of Second Lieutenant, and under certain circumstances that of field officers, which is now by existing devices more or less difficult.

"It is suggested," the Register states, "that Second Lieutenants wear on the shoulder strap one silver bar; that first Lieutenants wear two silver bars, and that Captains wear three silver bars. This would give an insignia to the Second Lieutenant, and the new method would be similar to that used in foreign services. As it is now, with so many enlisted men wearing the leather leggings, it is next to impossible to make a distinction between the soldier and the Second Lieutenant. It is also proposed that the marking on the sleeve of the overcoat shall be changed so that the Second Lieutenant will wear one scroll, the First Lieutenant two scrolls, and the Captain three scrolls; while the Major shall wear a broad solid band, the Lieutenant Colonel one broad band and one small one, and Colonel one broad band, and two small ones. This will facilitate the recognition of field officers at a glance, it being exceedingly difficult to do so where those officers wear more than three scrolls.

"There are no indications whether or not the Secretary of War will consent to this alteration, which is not, strictly speaking, within the character of changes in uniform which he forbade excepting in so far as alterations in the military dress and equipment were recommended by General Pershing as a result of his experience in France and in order to increase the efficiency of the force employed in the trenches.

"The General Staff has also under consideration designs for flags for the new army corps, divisions, and brigades, together with badges to be worn by members of those organizations. Nothing is known in the War Department of the reported order issued by General Pershing doing away with the familiar campaign hat for troops serving in the trenches. It will be retained, it appears, while in barracks and on furlough. In its place will be worn something like the fatigue headgear of the French Army, a sort of fore and aft arrangement made by sewing two heavy pieces of khaki cloth together with seams front and back, with side pieces which may be folded on the side of the cap or drawn down over the ears. It has the advantage of being pocketable and wearable under the shrapnel helmet."

Secretary of War Baker has issued an order reducing from 21 years to 20 years and 9 months the age at which students from certain designated colleges and universities will be received at the officers' training camps, which will be organized the first week in January.

"Much has been written," says The Harvard Alumni Bulletin, "about the direct advantages that have come to the members of the Harvard Officers' Training Corps from the instruction of the French officers. Some of the valuable by-products of this work are now beginning to appear. One of them is found in the fact that present members of the corps, undergraduates, too young for Plattsburg, are regularly going to the camp of the 5th Massachusetts Regiment, National Guard, at Framingham, to impart to the commissioned and non-commissioned officers there some of the lessons learned from the Frenchmen. The same influence went still further afield when General Wood summoned to Camp Funston, Kansas, a half dozen other young men, below the Plattsburg age, who were in the corps last Spring and Summer, that soldiers of the national army in the Middle West might receive their share of what the first French mission to America brought with it. There has hardly been a more striking concrete instance of the far-reaching effects of the interchange of telegrams between President Lowell and Ambassador Jusserand early last February."

The drinking of water at frequent intervals while on long "hikes" is not recommended by United States marines. While the average man should consume, according to medical authorities, from two to three quarts a day, troops on the march should drink this amount at regular periods and not sip a mouthful at a time, say the marine officers.

In Haiti, the Philippines, and other countries where the marines have been compelled to "hike" long and hard, men who constantly sipped at their canteens were the first to become exhausted. On the contrary, the men who drank their fill every two or three hours and not between times proved to be the best "hikers."

The Royal Flying Corps of Canada has transferred its headquarters for the Winter from Toronto to Fort Worth, Texas. Brig. Gen. C. G. Hoare, commander of the Canadian Division of the British Royal Flying Corps, has arrived at the Texas camp. Several American aviation squadrons are training with the Canadians at the Texas camp, which is to be one of the largest in the country.

Several army motor trucks, built under direction of Brig. Gen. Chauncey B. Baker of the Quartermaster Corps, were tried out recently at Fort Myer, Va. The new trucks are pronounced the most perfect for war purposes ever designed. Referring to the tests, which are still going on, a statement issued by the War Department, reads:

"The first tests were made near Fort Myer, where the trucks were run over heavy clay hills; in many instances the ground caving in under the wheels. The trucks were at no time in difficulty, and at every point escaped from cave-in and mud ditches either in forward or reverse power.

"The next tests were made at Fort Myer in a special ditch, four feet deep and seven feet wide. The trucks ran into a ditch on one side and climbed up and out on the other side without difficulty, despite the fact that the full load which the truck carried shifted to the rear on the upward climb, thus adding considerably to the actual weight.

"At Georgetown a heavy going ditch fifteen feet long with a 25 per cent. grade precedes a hill at 19 per cent. grade, forcing all vehicles to the lowest running speed before they reach the 19 per cent climb. The truck made the 19 per cent. hill on second speed without use of low speed, and carried the full-rated load."

FURY OF QUAKERS CRUSHES MICHIGAN

Penn's Line Rips Wolverines' Defense and East Wins Intersectional Battle, 16 to 0.

BERRY KICKS THREE GOALS

Starts Red and Blue on Way to Victory in Third Period—Weston and Straus Banned for Fight.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 17.—Michigan's undefeated football team came out of the West today, heralded as another of Hurry Up Yost's powerful scoring machines and was battered into submission by Pennsylvania's aggressive eleven by a score of 16 to 0. No greater bombshell has been exploded on the Eastern gridiron this season than the Wolverine's downfall at the hands of a lighter but faster team.

The fast charging line of Red and Blue, averaging only 172 pounds, played the giant forwards of the Maize and Blue off their feet. An enthusiastic crowd of 20,000 which filled Franklin Field, saw the seething battle and the student body of Old Penn went on a jamboree of joy just as soon as the game was finished.

To erratic Howard Berry, whose football prestige has been on the decline this season, belongs much of the glory of bringing Penn back into football prominence. In the third period, when Michigan had stubbornly refused to be pushed back, Berry lifted two field goals between the goal posts and later added another. The confidence born of this demonstration of Berry's skill, spurred the Red and Blue on to greater efforts, and in the fourth period the low charging line swept Michigan aside, while Captain Heinie Miller tore through and blocked a punt, giving Cleary, the Penn right guard, a chance to fall on the ball behind the line for a touchdown. Berry completed the afternoon's task by kicking the goal.

Lines in Furious Battle.

From the very first it was a grueling battle between the linemen. The towering Wolverine forwards, the same line which Willie Heston proclaimed as a human stone wall, became furious when they found the Penn players spilling them all over the turf. The battle between the players waged so furiously that it broke out in open rebellion early in the second period, and Weston, the Michigan quarter back, and Joe Straus began to hammer each other like a pair of middleweights.

When the other players saw Straus and Weston scrapping they rushed to the scene of the fray. Umpire Tufts and Davey Fultz was there first. When he separated the belligerent parties he ruled them out of the game for slugging. As Weston is the star player of Yost's forces and as Joe Straus is Penn's greatest battering ram, both elevens suffered as a result of the tempestuous uprising.

Genebach took Weston's place, but he couldn't fill the quarter back's shoes, while Roseneau took Straus's place in the Penn backfield. Straus's absence was just as costly to Penn as Weston's was to Michigan, and in the third period, when Penn had Michigan on her five-yard line, the Red and Blue backs were stopped short by the Michigan line. With Straus in there to deliver the final punch, Penn might have been able to carry the ball over.

For a team which had been touted as highly as Michigan the display of football with which it has been surprising its opponents all season must have been left at Ann Arbor. Penn outrushed the Wolverines all the way. Penn made 14 first downs during the game while Michigan made only 2. The reason that all of Penn's rushing did not have better effect was because of the frequent penalties which were inflicted on the Penn eleven. They were so overanxious that the officials had to slap on frequent punishment for off side play and holding. Penn was penalized in all 110 yards, while Michigan was set back 25 yards for violations of the rules. This constant illegal play by Penn annulled all the good results of the tearing gains they made through the Wolverine line.

Cheers for Penn Forwards.

Cheer after cheer went up during the game for the great defensive work of the Penn line. Wray, the fast centre, was everywhere, while the ends, Miller and Van Ginkel, completely outplayed the Michigan pair, Goetz and Boyd. Light was the king-pin of the secondary defense and time and again threw the Michigan runner for a loss.

As great a surprise as the clever manner in which Penn got the jump on the Michigan line was the inability of Yost's players to get under way to any sort of consistent attack. The crowd of Michigan rooters, who were back in the eastern stand, yelled repeatedly for the Western team to open up the attack.

Three times Michigan tried the forward pass and three times it failed. The only plays they had were a few old-fashioned line smashing thrusts through guard and tackle. These headlong plunges invariably resulted in the Michigan back being jumbled up in a hopeless tangle before the play got under way. Penn line men fairly dived under the Michigan giants and upset them before they got started.

The Michigan line was simply folded back until it fell all over the backfield. The only trouble was that Penn's charge was altogether too quick. In a closer game the flagrant violations of the rules in offside play and holding would have spelled their defeat.

Michigan's only demonstration of scoring power came just after the start of the game. After Culver had kicked off for Michigan to Van Ginkel, Straus and Light reeled off eight yards in a couple of rushes and then Bell shot a forward pass to Miller, which was intercepted by Weiman. After Hanish had plunged through the Penn line for a short gain Weiman punted over the goal line and Penn put the ball in play on the twenty-yard line.

Berry Forced to Punt.

Penn could not budge the Wolverines at this particular moment, so Berry punted. Weiman, Weston and Hanish then jammed their way through for a first down on three plays before the Penn line got its bearings. The Michigan backs looked as if they were going to do something. They started quickly and hit the line low and hard. As they were on their way for another first down Cohn fumbled, but recovered the ball at a loss, and Weiman was forced to Punt, Penn taking the ball on her own 20-yard line.

Then began a great march down the field by Penn. The attack was so fast and furious that the husky Michigan team was buried under the speed of Penn's charges. Straus, Bell, Berry and Light tore through five and six yards at a smash, hurling the Michigan players in all directions as they played yard after yard down the field. Beginning on the 20-yard line, Penn came on and on until they had the ball down on Michigan's 30-yard line. They had traveled 50 yards in this great attack and had bowled the Michigan huskies over in the steady hammering, which set the Michigan rooters into a frenzy as they frantically implored the Wolverines to "fight, fight, fight." The Wolverines were fighting, but it didn't do a bit of good.

With a touchdown in sight and with Michigan on the run, Bell attempted a delayed forward pass, but he delayed in throwing it to Miller so long that the Michigan players pounced upon him and he tossed the ball into the outstretched hands of Cohn and Penn lost the ball.

Punting Duel Begins.

In the second period Michigan tried to pass, but Weiman was forced to kick and he got his kick away well before the Penn ends were down on him. Punting duel with the Wolverines against the wind. Berry took the ball and one of Berry's long 50-yard boots was run back by Cohn to the 42-yard line. Penalty for holding sent Penn back 15 yards, and it was while Penn was trying valiantly to make this lost distance that the fight broke out between Weston and Straus.

The trouble started over a forward pass which Bell was trying to throw to Miller. Weston rushed in and began to mix up his hand as Miller was trying to make the catch. Michigan knew Miller's little knack of grabbing forward passes, so they were on the alert to break it up if they could. Straus happened along in time to get mixed up in the mêlée, between Straus and Weston, and before any one could stop there was a mass of wrestling athletes having a merry old time on the turf.

Umpire Fultz quelled the trouble just as several of the other players were preparing to join in the fray. Weston and Straus were put out of the game and the shock was so stunning to both Michigan and Penn that there was no more slugging noticeable.

The first half ended with neither team being able to score. In the third period Penn's jump began to tell and they caught Michigan napping after Berry had booted a long kick down near the Michigan goal. Genebach played the kick poorly and tried to get it on the bound. The ball rolled away from the Michigan quarter back, who tried to pick it up and fumbled it so long that Miller came rushing up the sidelines and fell on the ball on the 10-yard line. Here is where Penn missed Straus, for, although Berry, Light, and Bell hammered away at the Michigan line, they were unable to jam through.

Berry Boots Ball Over.

Berry dropped back to make a forward pass, but he ran into Referee Tufts and found that there was no one to throw the ball to. On top of this error Penn was penalized fifteen yards for holding, so Berry dropped back to the 30-yard line and kicked a field goal. The Penn crowd was wild with joy and it has been a long time since there has been a more enthusiastic demonstration at Franklin Field.

Berry added to the gayety of the occasion with a 20-yard dash through the Michigan line and Light pushed the ball along 10 yards more. Michigan was being pushed back into oblivion and suddenly a great snout went up from the Michigan crowd. Down on the side lines Coach Yost had called his battered and bruised Half Back Sparks and started him warming up.

With Sparks, their best back, in the game the crowd felt that Michigan would wake up and retrieve their failing fortunes. Just after Sparks got into the game Penn had the ball on the 25-yard line, and Berry dropped back to the 34-yard mark and again booted the ball over the cross bar for a field goal, making the score 6 to 0.

Michigan by this time was in complete rout. The line and the back field had become badly disorganized, and they failed at every play they undertook. It was only Weiman's fine kicking and the frequent penalties which were inflicted on the Penn team which saved Michigan from further disaster.

In the fourth period, when Weiman made a kick from the 20-yard line, Berry made a fair catch on Michigan's 47-yard line, and he attempted to kick a field goal, but the ball fell a bit short. When the ball was put into play on the 20-yard line Michigan made one final, desperate effort to work their open game, but their forward passes failed, and Weiman dropped back for a kick. Miller and Wray smashed through when the ball was passed and the Wolverine defense crumpled up. Miller blocked Weiman's kick as he stood on the 10-yard line, and the ball bounded back and rolled over the goal line.

Cleary made a long dive and gathered the ball under his arms as he tumbled on the turf, and the Michigans' downfall was complete. After this touchdown Berry kicked the goal, and again just before the end of the game he kicked another field goal.

Speedy Back Makes Three Touchdowns in Game Won by Score of 27 to 7.

Special to The New York Times.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Nov. 17.—Charging Colgate's forward wall with a persistent and powerful attack, Syracuse University's football eleven swept the Colgate players off their feet in the annual clash between these two rival teams, before a crowd of 20,000 in the Archbold Stadium here this afternoon, triumphing by a 27 to 7 score.

Almost from the first play the Orange was the aggressor. Colgate's line crumpled under the battling it received from the Orange forwards. Harry Robertson, centre, and Captain Cobb, tackle, of Syracuse, were responsible in no small measure for the superiority of the Orange line.

Matt Brown starred for the Orange, crossing Colgate's goal line for three touchdowns. Barsha, a Brooklyn boy, made the other, the first of the game, and then was forced to retire on account of an injury to his bad ankle.

Syracuse won the toss and received the ball on her 15-yard line, taking it by straight line bucks, interspersed with a forward pass, Meehan to Schwarzer, to the Maroon's 4-yard line. Barsha was then sent in to take it over the goal line. Meehan tried two drop kicks in the second half, but both went wide.

Colgate's lone touchdown came in the first period, when Webster intercepted Finsterwald's forward pass and ran 55 yards to the Orange goal.

HAMILTON AND UNION TIE.

Play to a Scoreless Draw on Steuben Field.

Special to The New York Times.

CLINTON, N. Y., Nov. 17.—Hamilton and Union fought to a scoreless tie on Steuben Field here this afternoon. Neither team showed marked superiority. Union twice forced the ball to Hamilton's 5-yard line, but in each case the Buff and Blue line held. The final whistle saved Union probably from defeat, as the game ended just as Hamilton was about to try a drop kick from the 10-yard line.

Moynihan and Jones starred for Union, while Lawler and Lowell did the best work for Hamilton.

LEBANON IS UNABLE TO CHECK OLIPHANT

Army Football Hero Personally Accounts for 32 Points in 50 to 0 Victory.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Nov. 17.—Lebanon Valley, a team which gave the Army much trouble a year ago and which was heralded as being likely to repeat again this year, failed to live up to expectations and was defeated by 50 to 0. It was the high scoring record of the season for the Army men.

Oliphant, the Western speed marvel, who plays the most consistent football of any of the Army men, led in the scoring bee. His record for the afternoon totaled thirty-two points. The blonde-haired full back registered four touchdowns, kicked five goals after touchdowns, and booted one placement goal from the forty-yard mark. His tackling and running with the ball was sensational. He was ably assisted by Wicks and Walker, both of whom displayed their best form of the season.

On the line, the veteran Knight acted as a "stabilizer," tackled with vengeance, opened wide holes in the collegians front wall, and was fast in the down-field work. Stokes, at centre, displayed an uncanny ability at recovering fumbles, three times getting onto loose balls. Once he carried the oval thirty-five yards after picking up a fumbled ball.

March, at end, scored a touchdown in the second period on a long forward pass from Murrill. Again, in the same quarter, he plunged the ball on Lebanon Valley's five-yard mark on a previous pass from Murrill, tossed from thirty-five yards back.

The lineup:

Army, (50.)	Position.	Lebanon V., (0.)

UPSET OF SEASON SCORED BY TUFTS

Dartmouth Surprised and Defeated, 27 to 0, by Open Game of Rival.

Special to The New York Times.

MANCHESTER, N. H., Nov. 17.—Tufts sprang a surprise here today by swamping Dartmouth, 27 to 0, in a game that was filled with spectacular passing and open plays. Dartmouth, with the exception of the first few moments of play, was thoroughly outclassed.

Three touchdowns were scored by forward passes from Captain Drummey, one going from midfield 35 yards to Mitchell, who carried it across. Mitchell took another pass over, running it for 40 yards. In the third period Jochim corralled the ball from a long pass for the last score. Drummey's touchdown followed scrimmaging.

Relying wholly upon line plunging, Dartmouth was at the mercy of Tufts's open order playing. Early in the first period the Green plowed out three first downs by rushing. Dartmouth's only threatening moment followed when C. Holbrook, while crossing the line, fumbled into Drummey's hands. Tufts backfield was heavier, but otherwise the teams were evenly balanced.

The lineup:

Tufts, (27.)	Position.	Dartmouth, (7.)
Jochim	L. E.	Freedberg

VIOLET GETS DRAW WITH STEVENS TEAM

Unbeaten Engineers Unable to Register Victory, but Escape Defeat.

BOTH SCORE ON PASSES

Hoboken Eleven Gets Touchdown in Second Quarter, but N. Y. U. Retaliates in the Third.

The unbeaten Stevens team was denied victory, though it escaped defeat, yesterday when the New York University football eleven invaded Castle Field and played the engineers a tie game, the final score of which was 6—6. The contest was hard fought from beginning to end, and only the merest chance prevented both teams from scoring more. Egan, the Violet quarter back, was the most conspicuous on the field. Besides doing his team's kicking and most of the running with the ball, he went back to his end tactics of a year ago and caught the forward pass that netted New York its tally. The Violet, outclassed physically by its opponents, overcame this handicap by its persistency and team work. Egan skirted both ends time and again for ten, twenty, and thirty yards, and when it was necessary Ebenfield, the consistent little full back, made the line plunge that netted the required distance for first down.

The Stevens team had a powerful man in Carlson, an end who seemed to be wherever his team needed him. He caught the forward pass that gave his team its touchdown and also blocked Egan's punt and ran the ball to where this pass was made possible.

The goal post cross bar caused havoc to both teams. Once Egan's kick for goal after a touchdown was invalidated by the offending bar and once within a minute of the final whistle Goodale's placement also rebounded into the field after striking it. Egan missed two drop kicks yesterday but the same luck pursued his opponents, for none of the four tries for a goal from placement by Goodale and Ford succeeded.

In the first quarter Stevens had the Violet on the defensive and only once, at the end, was the ball in the engineers' territory. In this quarter Goodale made two attempts at placement, once from the 40-yard line after his long end run of 30 yards had put his team into position, and once from the 30-yard line. Each kick went wide.

In this quarter, too, Egan tried a drop kick from near the 40-yard line but this attempt also went wild. By the end of the period the Violet had its opponents playing near midfield and from then on until the second period, when a penalty for holding put the engineers on their own 1-yard line, the lighter New York team shoved its heavier opponents back. After Ford punted from behind his own goal line the ball was on the Stevens 40-yard line and following a few ineffectual plays Egan attempted to punt. The big end, Carlson, was in on the ball and ran it past midfield before being downed. On the next play Goodale threw Carlson a long forward pass and the latter carried it 40 yards for a touchdown. Stevens lost its attempt for goal on the punt-out.

In the second half the Violet stiffened and after Egan's kickoff the engineers were unable to gain. After a punt by Ford, Buckley had the ball on the Violet 33-yard line. After several small gains Gardiner caught a long forward pass from Egan and traveled 30 yards before being downed. On the third play following this advance Egan himself went out and gathered in Buckley's forward and ran the ball over the line, tieing the score. On his attempt at goal the ball hit the cross bar.

From then on until late in the fourth quarter the ball seesawed back and forth between the two teams. Late in the last quarter the Violet had the ball on its 20-yard line, after Ford's punt had gone over the line. Here the New York team struck a snag and was forced to punt. Egan's kick went outside the 25-yard mark. On the next play, however, the Violet quarter back retrieved this loss by intercepting a forward and bringing the ball to the 35-yard line. Later in the period, after several substantial gains by Goodale, Deghuee and Piquet, who replaced Bloss, had brought the pigskin to the 20-yard line Ford dropped back to the 30-yard mark and tried a placement, but it went wide.

But fortune again was unkind to the Violet and few plays later found the engineers in possession of the ball on the 25-yard line. Goodale dropped back this time and tried another placement kick which hit the cross bar. Before either team could do more the final whistle blew.

YALE YOUNGSTERS TRAMPLE CRIMSON

Blue Freshman Eleven Outplays Harvard's Cub Team by Score of 14 to 0.

PLAY OF LAY STANDS OUT

Left Half Back of New Haven Lads Puts Up Great Game on Both Offense and Defense.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17.—Arthur Bride's Yale Freshmen football team beat the Harvard freshmen 14 to 0 in the Stadium this afternoon, scoring two touchdowns and goals. The counting was done in the first and last periods, between which Harvard often threatened the Yale goal, but was unable to produce any points.

The first Yale touchdown was made almost at the end of the opening quarter. Once the New Haven youngsters had lost the ball on downs on the Crimson five-yard line, to which point it had been carried mainly through the wonderful running of Lay, the team's big half back. After getting the ball and kicking out of danger, Harvard was unable to repeat its fine defense, and Yale in ten plays carried the ball from Harvard's thirty-nine-yard line to the twelve-yard line. Then Lay, breaking through the middle of the scrimmage, plowed over the last dozen yards for a touchdown.

In the last quarter Yale's touchdown was made after the team had met a reverse following an advance of nearly seventy yards from a point deep in its own territory, but Lay fumbled when within twenty-five yards of the Harvard goal. On the Harvard second play, however, when Humphrey tried to make a forward pass to Lee, half back Dines caught the ball on the run and legged it down the side-lines and across Harvard's goal line.

Midway through the game Harvard showed a lot of ground gaining ability. In the second quarter Humphrey, on a thirty-two-yard zigzag run, reached Yale's twenty-nine-yard line, but here three plays were stopped and then Frothingham missed fire in trying for a field goal.

Later in the period Humphrey made a long forward pass to Davis, one of the Harvard ends, who planted the ball on Yale's 11-yard line. Here Yale's defense was too much to be penetrated and after being stopped three times, Harvard lost the ball on Lothrop's fumble, Dilworth getting the ball for Yale.

In the third quarter Harvard was inside the Yale 30-yard line twice, but each time was stopped, once losing the ball on downs and later Lay intercepted a forward pass and galloped some forty yards up the field.

This was Harvard's last chance to score. Yale in the last twenty-five minutes had three chances to try for field goals, but French failed in the 34, 43 and 44-yard lines.

The game was hard fought and was by all means the battle of the year in the Stadium. Yale had the better drilled eleven and followed the ball much better than Harvard, besides tackling better and handling the ball cleaner.

Harvard, on account of the thirty-six yards it gained by means of the forward pass, outgained Yale in scrimmage play. The Crimson's net gain on fifty-two plays was 210 yards, while Yale's gain on fifty-one plays was 195 yards. Harvard, besides completing two forward passes, had seven of them go wrong. Two of them were incompleted, and Yale intercepted five others, four of them cleanly.

There was some fine punting by both French and Humphrey, but the star of the game was Lay, the Yale right half back. He was a power with the ball, and defensively played a game that would make any Varsity player green with envy.

FIELD GOALS PROVE COLUMBIA'S UNDOING

Boote Lives Up to His Name and Twice Scores for Wesleyan Eleven.

BLUE AND WHITE BAFFLED

Opportunities Are Wasted at Times by Overeagerness, Which Leads to Heavy Penalties.

There must be something in a name after all, since Bill Boote, the big, lanky left half back of the Wesleyan football team, twice lived up to his title yesterday by drop-kicking the ball over the goal posts, and by this means Columbia was defeated, 6 to 0, before a large crowd on South Field. To make it more certain Boote used his left foot for his efficient work. Throughout the game he booted the ball with superior judgment and uncommonly accurate aim, his punting helping greatly to undo the offensive efforts of Columbia.

Boote really achieved greatness with his initial drop-kicking effort, as he broke a scoreless tie, which had existed throughout the first half, and he sent the ball sailing true over the cross bar from an angle so difficult as to almost preclude a possibility of success. He was standing on the Columbia thirty-yard line and close to the side line. It was fourth down and the kick was called for as a forlorn hope. Boote was slow in his moves, but when he planted his foot against the ball it sailed between the posts and almost out of the grounds. His second drop kick, in the fourth quarter, was a comparatively easy effort of seventeen yards from directly in front of the posts.

Wesleyan Better Conditioned.

The one big difference between the two teams was Boote's kicking. During the first half neither side was able to make any great impression on the other, but toward the end of the game the superior condition of the Wesleyan team began to tell and when time finally was called Wesleyan was on the Columbia four-yard line and ready for a final drive for a touchdown.

It was one of the best games played on South Field this year. The tackling was clean and hard and the plays were run off with some semblance of football knowledge. Columbia usually masked every effort it made on the offensive and Wesleyan invariably shifted each time the ball was passed.

Wesleyan had a pair of tackles and a fast, heavy backfield which appeared much stronger than anything Columbia could bring forth. Anderson, right tackle for the visitors, earned a volume of cheers. He was used in a tackle back formation to carry the ball, and tore into the line with enough force to chalk up many yards for his side. On the defence he broke up many Columbia assaults. Time after time he tossed aside the interference of the Blue and White and threw the runner for a loss. E. E. Dixon, the other Wesleyan tackle, also spilled Columbia players often enough to discourage the Blue and White rooters.

Weinstein was again the individual star of the Columbia team. Playing at quarterback he roved over the entire field, did the punting and was the chief offensive man of the Blue and White. The only appreciable gains made by Columbia came through his efforts. He was badly battered before the game ended and was forced to give way to Lester near the close of the contest.

Columbia Misses Opportunities.

Columbia had any number of chances to score, but overeagernes on the part of the forwards prevented a possible touchdown. Several times, when Columbia was within the twenty-yard line, a forward was detected holding or else helping the runner and the penalty of fifteen yards, imposed each time, not only placed a touchdown out of reach, but set the team back so far that the drop kick and place kick efforts of Weinstein, Memmott and Kennedy were unsuccessful. Columbia was penalized 67 yards during the game and each time the penalty came just when it seemed that the Blue and White was started on a victorious march.

In the first half Columbia had five chances for a score. Memmott tried a drop kick from the 42-yard line, but the ball went under the bar. Again Weinstein signalled for a free catch in midfield and when a Wesleyan end roughed Weinstein Columbia got the ball on Wesleyan's 35-yard line. Here Kennedy attempted a place kick, but his effort was too low and it was intercepted. These two came in the first period. In the second period Weinstein twice failed at drop kicks and Columbia got the ball on her opponent's 16-yard line only to be penalized for holding.

Boote made an unsuccessful attempt at a drop kick in the second period, which was the only outstanding chance for Wesleyan during the first half of the game. In the first half Columbia tried three forward passes, two of which were grounded, and one, Canapary to Weinstein, was good for a gain of twenty-five yards. Wesleyan also tried three forward passes in the opening half, completed one for a ten-yard gain, grounded one and one was intercepted. Wesleyan made six first downs to four for Columbia in the opening half.

Long Run by Markthaler.

Next to Boote's successful drop kicks in the second half, a dash of twenty-eight yards around end by Markthaler to the Columbia seven-yard line was the outstanding feature. However, Wesleyan was denied a touchdown here, for the reason that after two tries at the line had failed to gain, Wesleyan was detected offside and lost five yards. Columbia also was penalized on the same play, but only two yards, this coming because it was the fifth time during the period that Columbia had taken time out to revive one of its battered gladiators. To make up for the lost touchdown, Boote at this juncture made his second drop kick of the game.

In the third period Wesleyan made one first down and Columbia none. Columbia punted three times, one being blocked, and Wesleyan punted thrice. Columbia fumbled twice and lost the ball each time. Wesleyan fumbled three times and recovered once. Columbia grounded two attempts at forward passes and Wesleyan got twenty-five yards on one attempt, after grounding two other tries.

The fourth period was all in favor of Wesleyan, which started the quarter with a spread shift formation for a forward pass. The pass hit the ground, however, but it opened the eyes of Columbia to the versatility of the visitors. Columbia could do little in advancing the ball and Weinstein resorted to punting, but only after he tried each time to pierce the forward wall of the visitors. Columbia tried several forward passes in this final period, in a more or less desperate effort to offset the advantage of Wesleyan, but none was completed and two were intercepted, one by Peck, centre of the visitors, and the other by Berlew, a Wesleyan back.

EASY TIME FOR LAFAYETTE.

Amasses 42 Points While Albright Gets None in Ragged Game.

Special to The New York Times.

EASTON, Penn., Nov. 17.—In a game played loosely on both sides and full of glaring football errors, Lafayette defeated Albright on March Field this afternoon by 42 to 0. Both teams showed their inexperience and greenness. The Albright team was so weak that it offered practically no opposition to the Lafayette onslaught. Lafayette stopped her own progress and curtailed her own score by frequent fumbling and committing many errors to which penalties attach.

The lineup:

Lafayette, (42.)	Position.	Albright, (0.)

OHIO STATE IS CHAMPION.

Led by Harley, Team Upsets Illinois in Deciding Game, 13 to 0.

COLUMBUS, Nov. 18.—For the second successive year the Ohio State football team has won the Western Conference football championship. In its deciding game here today Ohio State, led by the indomitable Chick Harley, defeated Illinois 13 to 0 in one of the hardest fought football games in conference history.

Chick Harley was the outstanding star of a collection of brilliant players. He carried the ball most of the time, and twice during the contest he sent the ball between the uprights for field goals. He scored his first field goal in the opening period, and after only a few minutes of play. From that score until the final period the two teams battled away savagely, using every known modern means to advance the ball, but without success.

In the final period Ohio State began another attack which was even more furious than that which had gone before. After three minutes of aerial work a forward pass was carried over the goal line by H. G. Courtney, and Harley kicked the resultant goal which brought the score 10 to 0. With only a short time left to play Ohio State lost the ball on its own thirty-yard line, and Harley brought the total to 13 with his second accurate field goal.

HARVARD CUB RUNNERS WIN.

Beat Yale Freshmen in Dual Race with Ease.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 17.—Harvard's freshman cross-country team won six of the first seven places in its annual race at Belmont against the Yale Freshman R. O. T. C. runners this afternoon. The Crimson team scored five of the first seven places, and the count in points was 19 for Harvard and 47 for Yale.

D. F. O'Connell, the Harvard captain, finished first by a small margin over his teammate, Nally, both men coming home under the Belmont short course cross-country record. O'Connell's time was 16 minutes 4 1-5 seconds, Nally being 5 4-5 seconds behind. The Harvard Captain's time was thirty-three seconds better than the previous record.

G. M. Boyd of Yale was the fastest runner in the New Haven group. However, he never pressed O'Connell and Nally closely, although he ran a splendid race as against the remainder of the Harvard freshman field.

Points were scored for the first ten men. T. A. L. Cady of Harvard followed Boyd of Yale home for fourth place, and B. W. Boyden of Harvard was fifth. Yale counted sixth with J. P. Britton, who beat C. A. Page of Harvard. The next three runners, all from New Haven, were [illegible] Johnson, [illegible] and W. [illegible]

WILLIAMS FINISHES WITHOUT A DEFEAT

Boynton Runs Wild Over Amherst and Keeps Slate of Team Clean for Year.

Special to The New York Times.

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass., Nov., 17.—Coach Walker's Williams team won its last game of the season by defeating Amherst, its most bitter rival, by 20 to 0. Williams went through the season without a defeat for the first time in the history of Williams College.

Boynton, the Williams quarterback, was the individual star of the game and made all three touchdowns. His playing seemed to bewilder Amherst. He made innumerable sensational runs during the game. His line plunges netted many yards, his end runs and open field work were especially brilliant, his punting and passing steady and straight and his tackling hard and sure.

The Amherst team found it impossible to solve the shift plays Coach Walker had planned for Boynton and he kept them guessing all the time.

For Amherst Captain Bodenhorn was the mainstay of the team and made many runs for a substantial gain.

There was no scoring in the first quarter but in the second, after each team failed to gain, Amherst gained possession of the ball at midfield and rushed to Williams' 15-yard line, when a pass was tried over the line which failed. The half ended with the teams still on even terms.

In the third period a perfectly executed forward pass, Boynton to Brown, netted the Williams eleven 40 yards and placed the ball on Amherst's 3-yard line and Boynton went over for the first touchdown. He also kicked the goal.

In the final period a pass from Boynton to Brown netted 30 yards and brought the ball on Amherst's 8-yard line. After two line plunges Boynton carried the ball over for the second touchdown. After gaining at will through the Amherst line Boynton made another run of 40 yards and carried the ball over.

The line-up:

Pitt Jams Way to Victory Over Carnegie Tech, 27 to 0.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 17.—The University of Pittsburgh football team scored a touchdown in each of the four periods of its game against Carnegie Tech today and won, 27 to 0. The Blue and Gold made first down twenty-three times, while Tech was successful only thrice.

In the first period, line smashing by Gougler and McLaren carried the ball to Tech's two-yard line, and McCarter went over for a touchdown, Gougler kicking goal.

In the second period a series of double passes, McLaren to McCarter, carried the ball down the field, and Gougler scored from the one-yard line and converted the play into a goal. Tech played its best in the third period and held Pitt scoreless until near the end, when Easterday and McCarter made several end runs for gains, and McLaren tallied from the three-yard line. Gougler missed goal.

In the last period the Panthers' touchdown came after a fine run of forty yards by Easterday after receiving Tech's punt out. After several smashes through centre by McLaren, Easterday ran around left for the fourth touchdown, and Gougler kicked goal.

MARINES BOW TO RUTGERS.

Eddie Mahan's Team Is Defeated by Score of 27 to 0.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Nov. 17.—The eleven of the Philadelphia League Island Marines, of which Eddie Mahan, former Harvard star, is captain, was defeated here this afternoon by a score of 27 to 0 by Sanford's Rutgers team. Although Mahan was unable to play because of an injury, his eleven showed strong resistance, and it was only by hard work that Rutgers was able to score four touchdowns.

The visiting eleven resorted to rough tactics in the second half, and Coach Sanford at one time interfered and threatened to take his eleven off the field. The marines outweighed the Rutgers team, but had no opportunity to score after Scott's field goal went wide in the first quarter. On the other hand, the Rutgers backs gained consistently, Gardiner making one and Whitehill three touchdowns.

All these scores resulted from running attacks started at midfield, with the exception of the score in the fourth period, when Breckley received a forward pass for a thirty-yard gain. Whitehill made the touchdown on a line plunge.

The marines' backfield could make little impression against the Rutgers line, but several passes, from Scott to Avery, accounted for good gains.

The lineup:

Rutgers, (27.)	Position.	Marines, (0.)
Robeson	L. E.	Avery

TRINITY GIVES YALE FIGHT.

Blue Barely Beats Visitors in Game by 7 to 0.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Nov. 17.—In the only game in the Yale Bowl this season between two football elevens other than class teams, the Yale informals today barely squeezed out victory over Trinity College, 7 to 0. The Hartford collegians were unable to gain by rushing but their punter, Hyland, continually drove back Stradella and Borders, on whose toe work the Yale reserves depended.

In the final minute of the game Trinity gave Yale a genuine scare, Stradella's kick being blocked at the Yale 5-yard line. Stradella saved the situation by falling on the ball. On his next punt to the Yale 30-yard line, Trinity failed to gain and the danger was averted when in the final play of the game Captain Nordstrom of Trinity missed a drop kick goal, which fell short.

Trinity made only one first down and Yale only four. Neither side registered first down in the second half. The only consistent ground-gaining of the game occurred in the second period after Reinhart of Yale had fallen on the ball on the Trinity 30-yard line, when Lynch muffed Border's punt. Yale's backs, Stewart and Reinhart, alternated in smashing attacks aimed at tackle till the 5-yard line was reached, when Stewart ploughed through guard for the only touchdown.

The lineup:

Yale Inf'mals, (7.)	Position.	Trinity, (0.)
Hendrickson	L. E.	King
Meekins	L. T.	Nordstrom

TAX IN TICKET PRICE.

Revenue to be Included in Admission for Rutgers Reserve Game.

Football enthusiasts who attend the game at Ebbets Field next Saturday between the speedy Rutgers eleven and Cupid Black's Newport Naval Reserves will not be asked to pay an additional tax as they enter the field. It has been decided to deduct the war tax from the regular admission money, so when a person purchases a ticket he will be paying the war tax as well as paying the admission price to the game.

The contest promises to be one of the best of the year in the metropolitan district between college and service teams. The 35-to-0 victory of the Naval Reserves over Brown last week certified the class of the sailor boys, and the victories scored by Rutgers over Fordham and Springfield by decisive scores indicate that Foster Sanford has built up another great team at the little New Brunswick college.

Sanford has been schooling his charges in the defensive work which he figures will break up the strong attack of the Reserves, but has found time to try out two or three new formations. Tickets for the game at Ebbets Field will be placed on sale early this week.

PASSES BY FORDHAM OVERCOME CORNELL

Led by Erwig, Maroon Registers One-Sided Victory at Ithaca by 27 to 6.

ITHACA, N. Y., Nov. 17.—Long forward passes, perfectly executed, and the dashing work of the visitors' backfield were responsible for Cornell's defeat here by Fordham today by a score of 27 to 6. Only in the first period, which was scoreless, did Cornell offer any real opposition. Cornell was within scoring distance several times during the game, but was checked by Fordham's defense.

A forward pass, Brennan to Fitzpatrick, scored Fordham's first touchdown in the second period. After another aerial attack had been successful, Erwig ran fifteen yards in the third period for a touchdown. Forward passes led to both touchdowns for Fordham in the fourth period.

Erwig was the star for Fordham, running seventy yards after the opening of the final period. Hoffman's spectacular punting was a feature of Cornell's play. Cornell's single touchdown was the result of a blocked Fordham punt in the fourth period, Colvin falling on the ball back of the goal lines.

EASY FOR PENN STATE.

Piles Up Total of 57 Points, Overwhelming Maryland State.

Special to The New York Times.

STATE COLLEGE, Penn., Nov. 17.—Pennsylvania State routed Maryland State's football eleven here today, 57 to 0. It was the first meeting of the two colleges on the gridiron. The visiting team proved easy prey for the Blue and White, which was smarting under its recent defeat by Lehigh. Captain Conover and his men romped through Maryland's line and around her ends for eight touchdowns.

Bob Clarke booted an easy field goal from the twelve-yard mark, and Conover tallied six goals from touchdowns. Charlie Way, the Penn State quarterback, and Robb, left half back, were the luminaries of the team's attack. Way's open-field running thrilled the crowd. He flashed through the Southerners repeatedly for long runs of seventy, fifty-five, and forty-five yards.

LEHIGH HAS HARD BATTLE.

Penn Military Team Beaten, but Puts Up Good Game.

Special to The New York Times.

BETHLEHEM, Penn., Nov. 17.—Lehigh had its hands full today in mastering Penn Military College, although the final score stood 34 to 6. The visitors, a scrappy set of youngsters who were in the play every minute of the time, showed flashes of speed that took Lehigh off its feet at times. Once in the second period the visitors took the ball down the field for 60 yards, mainly on two cleverly executed forward passes, for a touchdown. Lehigh on end plays gained considerable ground, Maginness, Wyosocki, and Herrington ripping off good runs.

The lineup:

GOPHERS ON A RAMPAGE.

Minnesota Surprises Chicago, Winning by 33 to 0 Score.

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., Nov. 17.—Minnesota celebrated homecoming day with a 33 to 0 victory over Chicago, which eliminated the Maroons from the Big Ten Conference championship race. The Minnesota surprise team, stung by defeat at the hands of Wisconsin, played with a vim that completely bewildered Coach Stagg's warriors and kept them on the defensive throughout.

Using intricate shifts and fake formations, the Gophers battered gaps in the opposing line and shot through Lampi, Arnston, and Carroll for consistent gains. Chicago, on the other hand, was never able to break through the Gopher barrier for material gains, and for the most part Maroon plays were muddled before they were well under way.

STEIN LEADER AT TRAPS.

Breaks 96 Out of 100 Clay Birds in N. Y. A. C. Event.

Excellent shooting was uppermost at the Travers Island traps of the New York Athletic Club yesterday. Although the conditions were not of the best, straight scorings of twenty-five targets won legs on every one of the regular weekly fixtures.

Conrad Stein did the best work, winning not only the high scratch prize but also scoring on both the Club and the Accumulation cups. Although he was not eligible, as he was the winner of the high-scratch prize, Stein also tied for the high-handicap prize. In the scratch shoot, the winner had 96 out of a possible 100 tarkets, the best scratch score registered at Travers Island so far this season.

R. L. Spotts also was a double winner, as he alone ran straight in the shoot for the Travers Island Cup. A. C. Bennett, winner of a special, scored the only leg on the Haslin Cup. The scores:

HARD GAME FOR BROWN.

Colby Gives Spirited Battle, but Is Beaten, 19 to 7.

Special to The New York Times.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 17.—Brown ran up against a proficient team in Colby this afternoon at Andrews Field, but won out by the score of 19 to 7. The Providence eleven started out with a rush by tallying twice in the first quarter and once in the second period. From that time on, however, the two teams fought it out on fairly even terms.

Features of the second half were the forward passing and open work of the Colby team, and the splendid defense under the shadow of their goal posts made by Brown. Brown pushed back the Colby team twenty-three yards in four downs when the visitors had advanced the ball by a series of beautiful forwards to the Brown two-yard line.

The Colby touchdown was made possible by a technical interference with the catching of a forward, the Maine team obtaining the ball on Brown's six-yard line and taking it over in one play.

During the first half there were many long runs by the Brown backs. Armstrong made one of fifty-eight yards, Brooks another of forty-six, and Herriott one of twenty-five. Brown showed a distinct reversal of form in the second half, however, playing a ragged game with a weak offense and a mediocre defense.

The lineup:

Brown, (19.)	Position.	Colby, (7.)
Albright	L. E.	Perry
Sinclair	L. T.	Bucknam
Bowman	L. G.	Newman

CURTIS HOLDS LEAD IN SOCCER SERIES

P. S. A. L. Champions Defeat Bushwick High School by Score of 1 to 0.

Curtis High School kept in the van of the P. S. A. L. soccer competition yesterday by defeating Bushwick High by the close score of 1 goal to 0 at Bushwick Field. The single goal came after twenty minutes of play in the second half, when MacKen, the Staten Island centre, took a pass from J. Lynch, who had made a good run down the field, and found Bushwick's net.

The champions were below their usual form, missing several good openings in the first half, and, at times, were outplayed by the Bushwick team. Quinlan and J. Lynch starred for Curtis and Jaeger for Bushwick.

The lineup:

Curtis, (1.)	Position.	Bushwick, (0.)
Leonard	G.	Steinhofer
Clark	R. B.	Drenkhardt
Methfessel	L. B.	Jaeger
O'Brien	R. H.	Rosenberg
Quinlan	C. H.	Anderson
Crabtree	L. H.	Levine
Stout, (Capt.)	O. R.	Wein
J. Lynch	I. R.	Keegan
MacKen	C.	Stahl
Pearce	I. L.	Rosen
R. Lynch	O. L.	Rosofsky

Referee—V. Williams, P. S. A. L. Linesmen—V. Markham, Curtis, and I. Zuckerman, Bushwick. Goals—MacKen, Curtis.

Substitutes—Maloy for Crabtree, Nans for Steinhofer, Steinhofer for Drenkhardt, Gubel for Levine. Time—Halves of thirty minutes.

The victory of Curtis High gives the P. S. A. L. soccer champions a total of 12 points in the competition, while Evander Childs, as a result of a 2—0 defeat of Boys High, retains second place with 11 points.

Evander Childs High School defeated the Boys' High players by 2 to 0 at the Prospect Park Parade Grounds yesterday. Brown, centre forward in the Evander lineup, scored from a pass by Helfman in the first half. The second tally came in the second period, Toorock, with Helfman's help, negotiating the goal.

Commercial High soccer players achieved their first victory yesterday when, at the Prospect Park Parade Grounds, they defeated Manual Training by the score of 1 goal to 0. The game was scoreless until the middle of the second half, when Karp made the winning goal.

NAVY CLOSES IN TRIUMPH.

Adds Another Big Score to Record at Expense of Villanova.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Nov. 17.—The Navy this afternoon closed the most successful gridiron season in recent years by defeating Villanova 80 to 3. The visitors' lone tally, which was the first score of the game, came quickly after play started and was made by McGuckain, who played a star game throughout for the visitors. Shortly after the kickoff a forward pass, Wegand to McCrady, netted 25 yards. This was followed by a 15-yard penalty, which put the ball on the sailors' 30-yard line. Two plays failing to gain, the visitors resorted to kicking.

Not at all disheartened, the middies came back with a rush and before the period closed had tallied 14 points. A feature of the game was the open field running of Roberts for the middies.

Although today's game closes the list of scheduled games for the middies, every effort is being made by the local athletic authorities to land a contest for next week.

The lineup:

Navy, (80.)	Position.	Villanova, (3.)
Von Heimberg	L. E.	McCrady
Barrett	L. T.	O'Leary
Newburn	L. G.	Renant

HIGGINS TOO FLEET FOR RIVAL RUNNERS

Crack Harrier of Morris High School Captures P. S. A. L. Title Handily.

TEAM LAURELS TO FLUSHING

Long Island Institution Takes Championship for the Third Year in Succession.

Walter Higgins, an 18-year-old youth of the Morris High School team, completed his first season of cross-country running by winning the individual title in the high schools championship of the Public Schools Athletic League, held over the Jamaica course yesterday afternoon. His margin of victory over A. Tracy of Flushing High was only five yards, but it might have been stretched into fifty if the Morris youth had exerted himself for the full two and four-fifth miles that constituted the test for the budding hill and dale contestants. The Morris lad had every reason to fear the prowess of Tracy, for the leader of the Flushing team was a comparative veteran who finished fourth in the title race last year, behind Crawford, Kiviat, and Locker, all of whom have since been graduated from their respective schools.

Only one other runner showed form approaching that of Higgins, while Tracy was backed up by a sterling quintet that easily landed the team honors for Flushing for the third successive year. The Flushing boys showed excellent team work, and there was not a poor runner on the winning team, which made a remarkable record by landing four boys in the first seven, and the complement of five was tallied when the eighteenth man was checked off by the scorers. This gave Flushing the low winning total of 37 points, against 56 credited to the team from the same school last year.

Stuyvesant in Second Place.

Stuyvesant High showed great improvement, and put an even team in the field that, without any very forward scorer, managed to take second place with 114 points, an advance of nine positions over the place occupied by the Dutchmen a year ago. Erasmus Hall was third with 123, High School of Commerce fourth with 140, and then came Morris High, which dropped off in scoring ability after Higgins and the second man on the team had been counted.

The latest winner of the high school title bids fair to develop into a cross-country star of high magnitude. His time for the distance was 15:22, which is faster by four seconds than that made by Crawford in winning over the more difficult Van Cortlandt Park course. Though the going was easier yesterday and contained little uphill work, the distance was computed as further than when Crawford won, and the manner in which the Flushing lad held his competitors all through the race indicated that he could have run much faster had there been any one to extend him. So far Higgins has a clean slate in cross-country competition. In his short career he has scored three victories, leading his team and the rival runners in dual meets with Barringer High, Columbia freshmen, and Evander Childs.

A large entry, perfect weather, and well-trained contestants combined to make the run yesterday one of the most successful held by the P. S. A. L. Fifteen teams, representing all the boroughs of Greater New York, went to the starting mark, and all but Curtis High finished enough men to entitle them to a place in the standing. There were 118 boys in line when the starting signal was given, and all but ten of these completed the course. The start and finish took place on Hillside Avenue, but the block in front of Jamaica High School was so well policed that the busy automobile traffic was diverted while the race was in progress. The course led into Upland Park, and in order to get as much real country as possible, two circuits were made of the lake in the park.

Higgins Takes Lead at Lake.

The leaders were bunched until they reached the lake, when Higgins went into the lead and thereafter set the pace for the crowd. A. C. Weyman of Boys' High was his immediate follower around the two circuits of the lake, and in order to make victory sure Higgins stepped out as he took the downhill grade into Hillside Avenue, so that he had a lead of thirty yards when he reached the main highway at Hillcrest Avenue.

Tracy was going great guns then and passed Weyman to go in pursuit of the leader. It was a hopeless task, for Higgins was running easily with even stride, arms low, and a smile on his face that betokened plenty of reserve power.

While Tracy was gradually lessening the distance between himself and Higgins, the Flushing boy was looking over his shoulder, and he cut the finish so fine that as he passed the judges there was only five yards separating him from Tracy. The latter's finishing spurt had placed him twenty yards in front of Weyman, who beat M. Bello, the second boy to finish for Flushing, by ten yards. A. Schaeffer of Manual Training was fifth, and the others followed in close order.

All the lads finished in good condition, which gave evidence that they had been better prepared than were some of the contestants in the A. A. U. junior championship a week previous.

The order of finish of the first fifty follows:

1—W. Higgins, Morris High..........15:14
2—A. Tracy, Flushing High..........15:15
3—A. C. Weyman, Boys' High..........15:22
4—M. Bells, Flushing High..........15:28
5—A. Schaefer, Manual Training..........15:28
6—M. Schaefer, Flushing High..........15:39
7—A. Sulzbach, Flushing High..........15:42
8—J. Brickman, Morris High..........15:45
9—A. Ward, Evander Childs..........15:46
10—J. Buck, Evander Childs..........15:47
11—W. Allen, Stuyvesant High..........15:49
12—J. J. Welsh, Curtis High..........15:52
13—W. Rick, Erasmus Hall High..........15:53

SURPRISE FOR CRESCENTS.

Sailor Soccer Players Defeat New Moon by 4 to 2.

The soccer team of the steamship Tuscania furnished a surprise to the Crescent Athletic Club, champions of the Field Club League, at Bay Ridge yesterday afternoon, the sailors winning by 4 goals to 2. At half time the score stood at 1 to 1. Sergeant Valentine, a Scotch player, who is connected with the British Recruiting Commission now here, was in the Crescent line-up, and made a good showing at inside left.

QUAKER RUNNERS TRIUMPH.

Columbia Beaten in Dual Meet Over Long Course.

University of Pennsylvania and Columbia University cross-country teams engaged in their annual cross-country chase yesterday at Van Cortlandt Park over the national A. A. U. championship course of six miles, and the honors were easily garnered by the Penn harriers. They showed the better balanced team and finished closely bunched to win, 17 to 47. The race was an individual triumph for Glover, one of Penn's star harriers. He judged his pace well throughout the strenuous grind and won in 33:42. At the finish line he was followed by McHale and Cummings, teammates.

Captain Al Hulsenbeck was the first of the local collegians to cross the finish line and he was in fourth place. The order of finish of the first nine runners with their times follows:

Glover, Pennsylvania, 33:42; McHale, Pennsylvania, 34:26; Cummings, Pennsylvania, 34:59; Huelsenbeck, Columbia, 35:04; Larson, Columbia, 35:13; Brooks, Pennsylvania, 35:30; Turner, Columbia, 35:45; Moss, Columbia, 35:52; Erdman, Pennsylvania, 35:53.

WORLD'S SERIES LARGESSE.

Baseball Players Reap Profit from Championship Games.

Some idea of the amount of money that falls to the share of a big league baseball player who is fortunate enough to participate in several world series can be gained from a recent compilation showing the winnings of various players who have figured in such post-season contests in the past few years. Jack Barry leads the list with $17,937 as a result of his participation in six series. Eddie Collins, who has also figured in an equal number of world championship contests, as a member of the Philadelphia Athletics or the Chicago White Sox, is second, having amassed 14,580.

Jack Coombs has collected 13,627; Chief Bender, 11,743; Eddie Plank a like sum, and Johnny Evers, $7,983. This quartet of players figured in five series. Amos Strunk, John McInnes, and Frank Baker played in four series while members of the Philadelphia Americans, and their reward was $10,911 each. All things considered, Larry Gardner, Forest Cady, Harry Hooper, and Duffy Lewis of the Boston Red Sox probably hold the record as each of them won $11,050 by playing in three series. Christy Mathewson collected $9,525 in the form of extra dividends while a member of the New York Giants. Charley Herzog and Arthur Fletcher came in for $9,713 due to their membership in the same team. Chief Meyers, Rube Marquard, and Fred Merkle won $9,881 while playing for the Giants and the Brooklyn Nationals.

INTEREST IN CYCLE RACE.

Six-Day Contest to be Held Dec. 2 to 8 Attracts Attention.

Interest in the six-day bike race is growing as the date of the annual contest, which will be held at Madison Square Garden the week of Dec. 2 to 8, approaches. While sporting devotees have attended these grinds in New York's historic amphitheatre for more than twenty-five years, few know that the six-day game originated in Europe more than forty years ago.

Six-day cycle races date from about 1875, when a twelve-hour-a-day affair was run in Birmingham, England. A little later, one of eighteen hours a day was held in London. The first invasion of America took place in 1879. Peter Duryea and Jack Haverly brought over a team from Europe and gave exhibitions and rode six-day races, of three and six hours a day, on roller skating floors in New York, Boston, Chicago, and other cities.

In 1886 Tom Eck constructed the first track having banked or raised corners in a hall at Springfield, Ill. This was the first time the riders were able to make turns at full speed. The first real six-day race in America was held in the Washington Rink, Minneapolis, Minn., long before they rode these races on the Island of Manhattan. Albert Shock won with 1,405 miles. W. T. Morgan was second, and Louis Armaindo was third.

The first six-day race ever held in Madison Square Garden was in 1891, seventeen riders starting and riding twenty hours a day. Bill Martin of Lowell, Mass., won with 1,446 miles. He rode on an old style ordinary wheel. Charlie Ashinger, on a high wheel, won in 1892, while in 1893 Albert Shock won on a safety bicycle. There was no race in 1894. In 1895 a women's race was contested and was won by Frankie Nelson.

In 1896 the man's race was resumed and Teddy Hale, from Ireland, won, while Charlie Miller of Chicago accounted for the races in 1897 and 1898. In 1899 the authorities passed a law prohibiting the contestants from riding more than twelve hours a day. Team racing was then taken up. The first team contest was won by Charlie Miller and Frank Waller. They covered 2,733 miles and four laps, a record that stood until 1908, when McFarland and Moran won with a total mileage of 2,737 miles and one lap. The late Harry Elkes and Floyd McFarland won in 1900, and in 1901 the race was won by Walthour and McEachern. George Leander and Floyd Krebs won in 1902. Walthour repeated in 1903 with Benny Munro as a partner.

Eddie Root won his first six-day race in 1904, his partner being Oliver Dorlon. Root repeated the next year, but this time his mate was Joe Fogler, the Brooklyn cyclist. Fogler and Root won again in 1906. For the first time since team racing was inaugurated a foreign team won the race in 1907, when Walter Rutt of Germany, and John Stol of Holland came home in front. Floyd McFarland again put his name among the winners in 1908, when, with Moran as his partner, he won and established a new six-day record of 2,737 miles and one lap.

In 1909 McFarland started with Jackie Clarke and Rutt had Stol as his mate. McFarland and Stol retired and Rutt and Clarke paired up. They not only regained the lap they were penalized, but had a lap lead at the finish. Eddie Root and mate won in 1910. The 1911 race saw Frank Kramer in his first six-day race and he had Jimmy Moran as his partner. The best they could do, however, was to finish in second place, a lap behind the winners, Clarke and Fogler. Fogler was again a member of the winning team the following year. His partner was Walter Rutt, the demon Dutchman, who recently was killed in the European war.

The 1913 race brought Alfred Goullet to the fore. With Fogler as his mate the pair carried off the honors. Goullett also accounted for the 1914 race, with Alfred Grenda as his partner. The following year saw a new world's record created, when Grenda and Hill won with a total mileage of 2,770.8 miles. A foreign combination won the 1916 race when Egg and Dupuy pedalled to victory.

The world's record for the six-day event, held by Hill and Grenda, was created in the 1915 race, when no less than eleven teams tied for top honors with 2,770.8 miles. In the Berlin finish Grenda and Hill were awarded first place, although Reggie McNamara and Bob Spears had the most points at the end of the series of sprints in the final hour. A little rough riding by Spears early in the hour cost his team the prize and the world's record.

Previous to that the record was 2,758.1 miles, made by Grenda and Alfred Goullet the year before. This mark shattered the new record of the previous year, 2,751 miles, by Goullet and Joe Fogler. A new record was set in each of three successive years—1913, 1914, and 1915.

To date six teams have been signed for the coming race, two of these coming into the fold yesterday. They are the Spencer brothers—Arthur and Willie—and the Bowkar brothers—Lester and George. Arthur is the world's sprint champion, having succeeded Frank Kramer to that crown last Summer.

MANY NEW MARKS AWAIT APPROVAL

A. A. U. to Pass On an Unusual Number of Record Applications Today.

An epoch-making year, from a competitive standpoint, has been completed by the Amateur Athletic Union, according to a compilation of the records which will be applied for at the annual convention in St. Louis today. The sport which was productive of the most records was swimming, in which male and female exponents of the sport erased many American marks and created several new world's records according to the rules of the International Swimming Federation. Norman Ross of the Olympic Club of San Francisco was credited with three of these world's swimming records and he also created several American records. In the women's branch of the sport Claire Galligan, the local mermaid, Olga Dorfner of Philadelphia, and Dorothy Burns of Los Angeles, were the chief figures in record-breaking performances.

In the running division six records were hung up, four of them being made in this city. Two athletes ask for records at 300 yards, George Dernell covering this distance in 0:32 1-5 at the Junior National Indoor Championships at Buffalo last January, while Andy Kelly, the Holy Cross College star, was clocked in 0:31 2-5 at the Senior National Indoor Championships at the Twenty-second Regiment Armory on March 17. Applications for records at 1,000 yards and one mile are made by John W. Overton, the Yale star, while Jole Ray of the Illinois A. C. is credited with a record for two miles.

At walking, Willie Plant and Eddie Renz, the local athletes who hold national titles, have been clocked in record time, the former for two hours and the latter for fifteen miles, both outdoors. The record time which was credited to George Bonhag for his effort at the New York A. C. Spring games is noticeably absent.

The record claimed by Clinton Larsen, the Brigham University athlete, for the high jump, will probably not be approved because it was made in an exhibition, while the rules of the A. A. U. specifically state that a record must be made in sanctioned competition to be recognized.

Following are the records that will be passed on by the national committee:

FINAL MEETING AT BOWIE.

Season's Last Running Events to be Started Tomorrow.

BOWIE, Md., Nov. 17.—The final race meeting under the rules of The Jockey Club for 1917 will open at Prince George's Park on Monday, under the auspices of the Southern Maryland Agricultural Association. The meeting will continue for eleven days, and will end on the last day of November. An error in applying to the County Court of Prince George's for a license delayed the opening, which was originally scheduled to follow the closing day at Pimlico. Bowie offers an attractive card, and the meeting will be supported by the strongest stables in the East.

There will be seven races each day, none of smaller value in added money than $600, with handicaps running as high as $1,000, and, in an effort to put Bowie in the limelight as a place for great racing, Mr. O'Hara has offered a purse of $5,000 for a match, the distance and weights to be arranged by the contracting trainers, between Wilfrid Viau's great three-year-old Omar Khayyam and John W. Schorr's Western crack Cudgel.

Wilfrid Viau and his trainer, Richard F. Carman, are at Bowie with Omar Khayyam, which is ready to meet Cudgel or any other horse in the land at any distance. Omar, one of the toughest campaigners that ever bore silks, came nicely out of the Bowie Cup race, in which he was beaten by his stable companion, Westy Hogan, in the fastest time for one mile and a half of which there is a record at Pimlico, and is as fresh today as he was at the beginning of the season. Definite word of Mr. Schorr's intentions with regard to the match has not been received, but Mr. O'Hara is assured that Cudgel will come to Bowie if transportation can be obtained.

Besides the stable of Wilfrid Viau, other recent arrivals are the establishments of Samuel Ross, William P. Burch, Edward Beale McLean, and E. T. Zollicoffer of Washington; J. K. L. Ross, D. Raymond, John Lumsden, and A. Bulcroft of Montreal; Thomas Clyde, Alfred Hennen Morris, Wilfrid Davies of Toronto; Captain W. J. Press of Ottawa; Robert J. Walden, Captain Ral Parr, G. K. Bryson, J. O. Talbot, J. E. Claver, R. T. Wilson, James Arthur, W. Smith, Frank Farrar, the Mirasol Stable, James F. Johnson, M. Shea, Daniel Cunningham, E. C. Griffith, the Nassau Stable, Paul Powers, William Shields, Dr. J. S. Tyree of Washington, O. C. Rasch, H. C. Hallenbeck, H. J. Morris, J. S. Owenby, R. H. H. Mackenzie, William Cahill, Frank Bain, G. C. Walsh, G. E. Phillips, C. W. Gasser, J. J. Fitzgerald, C. P. Whitney, W. R. Mizell, Mrs. J. P. Mayberry, R. J. Donovan, Edward McBride, H. Meise, John Burtschell, W. A. Burtschell, Gifford A. Cochran, the Brighton Stable, George W. Beardmore, Major E. B. Cassatt, and Oscar Lewisohn.

Prince Georges Park, which is situated on the Washington-Baltimore interurban electric line, is one of the most accessible of Maryland tracks. It is about twenty miles distant from each of the cities which contribute most largely to its support.

BROTHERS TRIUMPH IN TANK

Stuyvesant High School Stars Help Team to Victory.

Stuyvesant High School's swimming team triumphed over the representatives of the Townsend Harris High School yesterday in the latter's natatorium, by a score of 38 to 15. Stuyvesant accomplished its victory mainly through the efforts of W. Eberhart and F. Eberhart, brothers. W. Eberhart won the 50-yard swim and helped his team to victory in the relay race, while F. Eberhart carried off the honors of the 100-yard event. The feature was the 220-yard swim, which resulted in a dead heat between C. Schenck, Stuyvesant, and R. Pfeiffer, Townsend Harris Hall.

The summaries:

YALE BARS CUB SWIMMERS.

Decides Freshmen Not Eligible for 'Varsity Team.

The action of the Yale Board of Athletics in deciding there shall be no change in the rule barring freshmen from 'Varsity sports has caused new plans to be laid for swimming.

Earlier in the season it looked as if the rule in question would be suspended during the war, and the New Haven delegates suggested at the annual meeting of the Intercollegiate Swimming Association that first-year students be allowed in water sports. Now that the matter has been adjusted, the suggestion will be withdrawn and the usual eligibility code maintained.

Richard Mayer, Captain of the Yale swimmers, has formed class teams, combining, however, the senior and sophomore material owing to the scarcity of the former, due to the heavy enlistment. He will arrange intermural meets to enable the candidates to earn in competition the positions on the 'Varsity and freshman aggregations.

The alteration in the plans has urged upon Captain Mayer the advisability of putting off the team's début in the championship tournament, and he has booked the first dual meet for Jan. 12, against Pennsylvania, instead of starting activities the first week in Dec...

PLAYING OF KIRKBY TAKES GOLF MATCH

Metropolitan Champion a Big Factor in Defeat of Travers and Guilford, 4 and 3.

Playing steady golf, in which each member of the winning pair rose to the occasion whenever the other seemed to be wavering, Oswald Kirkby of Englewood, metropolitan amateur champion, and John G. Anderson of Siwanoy, Westchester amateur champion, defeated Jerome D. Travers of Upper Montclair and Jesse Guilford of Boston in a four-ball match at Englewood yesterday by 4 up and 3 to play, after thirty-six holes. The exhibition was arranged as a benefit for the Y. M. C. A. fund and a fair crowd followed the four experts around the side hill course.

In the morning it was Kirkby who played the exceptional golf and gave his team a lead at the noon rest of three holes, which Travers and Kirkby were never able to overcome. Kirkby had an approximate 73 for the morning eighteen holes, as compared with a 78 registered by Travers, Guilford, and Anderson. Kirkby needed little help from Anderson, but the Westchester champion managed to get into action twice and each time his efforts brought a hole to his side. At the seventh in the morning Anderson had a 3 to win the hole and again at the tenth he got a 4 to win that hole.

During the afternoon round the first nine holes were halved in equal figures with Travers and Kirkby doing the best work of the four. Anderson stepped into the breach at the tenth with a 3, which took that hole and Travers won back the advantage at the fourteenth with a 4. Anderson settled the match for good and all at the fifteenth when he sank a 6-foot putt for a 2 at the short hole. Travers approximated a 72 in the afternoon, which equals par, while the others had 77 each.

Guilford found the course a bit strange and was not overaccurate in his approach shots. He got good distance off the tees and several times his iron shots were well placed, but in the main he found trouble and was not up to his usual good game.

Kirkby and Anderson were 3 up after the morning eighteen holes and held this advantage to the end. The best ball of the winners was 70 in the morning and 71 in the afternoon to 73 for Travers and Guilford in the morning and 71 in the afternoon. The best ball cards follow:

HARVARD RALLIES TO SPORT

Figures Show Many Students Engage in Competition.

Despite the fact that Harvard has somewhat stepped out of the college athletic limelight, owing to the absence of a formal football eleven, the situation created by the war has been unable to dampen the ardor of the young manhood at Cambridge for competitive sport. It has been contended by educators for a long time that athletics should be more general and that less attention should be focused on the development of winning machines in the various branches of sport. This seems to be the case at Harvard now.

In an analysis of the situation The Boston Transcript recently brought figures to bear in proof of the fact that the popularity of sports has not diminished. The findings of The Transcript are as follows:

"A total of 276 undergraduates reported for the various freshman and university teams last month. Of this aggregate a slight majority were from the first-year class, but the 'Varsity sports, despite the fact that they are on only an informal basis, attracted 131 members of the college. These figures show that 17 per cent. of the entire registration took part in some branch of athletics—a greater proportion than was represented last Autumn. In consequence, it may be seen that the decline in the importance of Harvard sports has not been commensurate with the interest displayed in them.

"Crew has suffered the least from war conditions. As in normal times, more candidates reported to Coach Haines than to any other university coach; but, in addition, the decrease in the number of men out for rowing was less than in any other sport, although the Fall season of crew is of little importance in comparison with its Spring activity. Football drew the next largest lot of men, notwithstanding that the amount of its material diminished more than in other branches of athletics. Last year eighty turned out for 'Varsity football and ninety-four for the freshman squad. This Fall the university squad numbers only thirty-seven and the first-year candidates total fifty-four. The size of both aggregations has not been large enough to warrant a cut being made. Cross-country and baseball attracted almost as many as in past seasons. The only two minor sports organized, soccer and fencing, show only a slight decrease in the number of men reporting.

"Although freshman athletes are on as firm a basis as in former years and more attention is being given to them, the response of 1921 to the call for athletes has not been as large as that of the university as a whole. In every sport there were fewer aspirants from the entering class than was the case last Fall. The statistics show that 145 freshmen took part in athletics this season, in comparison with 196 in the 1916-17 term. Explanation may be found in the fact that the first-year class has not as big an enrollment as in the past."

SHOTGUN OWNERS ORGANIZE

John Philip Sousa Leads Sportsmen in Patriotic Endeavor.

With Lieutenant John Philip Sousa, America's bandmaster, as its national Chairman, and many prominent sportsmen enrolled as members, the National Association of Shotgun Owners, a new organization, promises to become a leading sporting assemblage as well as a patriotic organization. The only requirement for membership is the ownership of a shotgun, which makes its ranks open to any clay pigeon enthusiast in the country.

The main object of the organization is to cultivate familiarity wire firearms in a sporting way so that the nation may in time have thousands of resourceful experts to call upon if needed.

There are at present in this country 10,000,000 shotguns owned by different firms and individuals. The organization hopes that each of these guns will be in the hands of a man or boy capable of pointing it and shooting it accurately.

As the organization grows it is the intention of the leaders now to appoint State Chairmen and divide the assemblage into districts. Tournaments may be held for the different districts, with a final event for the winners, which may come closer than any other shoot in deciding the "blue rock" champion of America.

DROP KICK BEATS ANDOVER.

Lourie's Goal Gives Victory to Exeter by 3 to 0.

Special to The New York Times.

EXETER, N. H., Nov. 17.—Phillips Exeter Academy defeated its old rival, Phillips Andover, 3 to 0 in the annual football game this afternoon. The Exonians, after being stopped within half a yard of the Andover goal, managed to gain the victory by a drop kick.

Quarter Back Lourie in the second period, and on the second of his four tries for field goals, managed to boot the ball straight between the Andover uprights. The kick was made from the 33-yard line.

Andover played hard football and several times came close to scoring. In the third period, uncovering a very brilliant forward passing attack and a trick fake kick play, the visitors pushed Exeter back to its 15-yard line, but at this point a line attack failed and Andover lost the ball on downs. In the same period Andover again reached the Exeter 20-yard line, but once more was held, and Temple failed to tie the score by a drop kick from an easy angle.

In the last quarter Exeter was continually threatening Andover. Twice the ball was rushed close to goal, but the Exeter attack was stopped in the danger zone and Lourie missed field goals from the 31 and 26 yard lines. His other try for goal, made in the first period, was from the 33-yard line.

The lineup:

HARVARD LOSES AT NEWPORT

Naval Team Beats Crimson Eleven by 14 to 0 Tally.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWPORT, R. I., Nov. 17.—The Second Naval District football team won its third victory of the season by defeating the Harvard Informals, 14 to 0, at St. George School today, before a crowd of 6,000. Although greatly outweighed, Harvard played a strong defensive and offensive game, and surprised the all-star aggregation with a number of trick plays, especially the lateral pass.

Gerrish, formerly of Dartmouth, was the outstanding star of the game. His line plunging and running back of punts helped considerably in the Navy's scoring. The Navy line was a regular stone wall, and the Harvard backs were helpless in their attempts to break through.

It was in the second period that the strength of the Navy showed itself. Gerrish ran back a punt 15 yards, and followed this with a 7-yard plunge. Barrett, on a fake kick, tore off 40 yards around right end, putting the ball on the 20-yard line. Then a forward pass, Barrett to Hite, resulted in the first score.

Later in the same period Harvard had the ball on its own 15-yard line, and Harvard fumbled. The ball was picked up by Greene, the Navy's right end, who ran for a touchdown.

GAME TO BENEFIT CAMPS.

Receipts from Upton-Devens Contest to Buy Equipment.

The football game at the Polo Grounds Nov. 24 between the elevens from Camp Upton, located at Yaphank, L. I., and Camp Devens, at Ayer, Mass., will be for the purpose of buying athletic equipment for the regiments at these cantonments. These teams are among the best in Uncle Sam's service, and it is expected that the contest will attract a large crowd.

The use of the Polo Grounds has been donated to the soldier teams for the day by the New York National League Club, while many persons prominent in football and other sports are lending a willing hand in the staging of the game. Big Bill Edwards, famed as a gridiron star, has offered his services as umpire, while Bill Langford, who has officiated in most of the big games of recent years, has offered his services as referee.

It is planned to have a military drill before the game, the exhibition to be given by soldiers from Camp Upton. As many of the boys in khaki as may be spared on the day of the game will be on hand to cheer their team on, while the Camp Devens outfit will bring with it as many rooters as possible. Both elevens have a number of former college stars in the lineup, and the game should be a thriller.

The admission prices, including the war tax, will be $2 for the reserved section, $1.50 in the unreserved sections, and $1 in the bleachers.

ARE YOU QUALIFIED?

Excellent positions are now open to all those who qualify, not only for Government positions, but to fill the many vacancies in leading New York firms. It is the general opinion that stenography is a very difficult study to master. Such is not the case, as the average Moon student can take dictation at the rate of 100 words per minute at the expiration of 30 days by the Boyd Syl-lab-ic System. So confident are we that any young man or woman with an average education can attain a speed of 100 words per minute in shorthand in 30 days by our Syl-lab-ic System that we invite you to enroll at our risk. If, after becoming a student at one of our schools and attending for three days, you feel that it will be impossible for you to master stenography in 30 days' time, we will cheerfully return the entire fee.

St. Bartholomew's Parish House Auxiliary, Star Skirt Company, Free Shoe Fund Inc., Oppenheim Collins Building Auxiliary, Divine Paternity Auxiliary, Auxiliary 253, Christ Church Auxiliary, Forty-second Street New York Public Library, Church of the Covenant, Madam Rieffel School, New York Swedish-American Auxiliary, Young Woman's Social Club, Daughters of Columbia College War Relief, and the Junior Auxiliary.

The auxiliaries, numbering to date 284, and having a total membership enrollment of 7,016, were organized by the Department of Auxiliaries of the New York Chapter of which Miss Alice Lavinia Day is director. These auxiliaries are supplying a very large part of the supplies which regularly go out from the warehouse of the chapter to our war hospitals abroad and to our soldiers and sailors at home and overseas.

Interest in War Work Grows.

According to the annual report of Charles H. Stout, Secretary of the chapter, approximately 2,500,000 surgical dressings, hospital supplies, and hospital materials were made by the branches and auxiliaries of the chapter during the year. About two-thirds of these supplies were turned out since America's entrance in the war. The auxiliaries of the chapter helped stimulate laterest in war work and at the same time increased substantially the membership of the chapter, which has grown from 40,770 members last year to about 70,000 this year. One of the most important additions to the list of the chapter's auxiliaries is the volunteer workroom which was opened in 920 Broadway. This workroom is expected to turn out 250 machine-made hospital garments daily.

Armenian and Syrian Relief.

Under the caption "Deportations began again," the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, 1 Madison Avenue, has issued the following statement:

Greeks as well as Armenians and Syrians are suffering frightfully from Turkish persecution, and alike are helped by the American Committee. From the latest dispatches received, deportations of all Greeks in the Turkish Empire are being renewed with increased severity. "Calliste and her compatriots are in consternation at orders to move inland," is the way one writer in Beirut, Syria, managed to convey this information past the censor.

Confirmation has recently come from the Greek Government of a systematic extermination of these people under the guise of deportations. Daily thousands are being sent from Constantinople and the sea coast into the interior of Asia Minor, where silence covers their ultimate fate.

According to the Paris Temps, which receives reliable information via Athens and the Balkan agency, "More than 100,000 Greeks have been killed or died of hunger since the middle of August last. Meanwhile the Turks continue mercilessly their work of the wholesale assassination of an entire race, in obedience to the orders of their German counselors.

"The property of the unfortunates is confiscated, their furniture sold at auction, and the wives and children distributed among the German officers and the Mohammedan aristocracy. In Constantinople more than 3,000 Greek children have been sold as slaves. The position of the Greeks in the vilayets (districts) in the interior of Asia Minor is far sadder, as the Bashibovzouk (irregulars) are slaughtering them cruelly. All the Greek villages in the region of Smyrna, Aidin, Mannisa, and Aivaly were burned after being plundered.

Le Paquet du Soldat has between 400 and 500 of these soldiers on its list.

In order to reach the soldiers by Christmas the packages will be put up by a representative of Le Paquet du Soldat in Montbeliard, (Doubs,) France, and forwarded from there. The contents will consist of tobacco, cigarettes, candy, dried fruit, &c. The cost of each package is $1. Each contributor will receive an acknowledgment direct from the soldier who gets the package. The fund provides, as well, comfort kits, consisting of sweaters, mufflers, socks, tobacco, &c., for the soldiers. Last week's receipts amounted to $470. Subscriptions should be sent to Henry R. Sedgwick, Treasurer, 107 East Thirty-seventh Street, New York.

Atlantic Division, Red Cross.

The Atlantic Division of the American Red Cross will join with the twelve other Red Cross divisions in a nationwide Christmas drive to increase the membership enrollment in the Red Cross to 15,000,000. This means the addition of approximately 10,600,000 names to the present muster roll. The campaign is to start December 17 all over the United States and continue increasingly up to Christmas Eve. At a conference today in the national headquarters at Washington the general features of the membership drive were worked out and approved. Representatives of the Atlantic Division and all other divisions attended the conference.

Theodore N. Vail, President of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, has accepted the Chairmanship of the national committee appointed by the War Council to assume general charge of planning and later conducting the whole campaign. Dr. H. N. MacCracken, President of Vassar College, will be Executive Secretary. Other members of the committee are: Cardinal Gibbons, Bishop William Lawrence, Boston; Dr. Henry van Dyke, former Minister to the Netherlands, Princeton, N. J.; John W. Britton, San Francisco; Benjamin Gratz, St. Louis; B. Ban Johnson, Chicago; Hervey Lindley, Seattle; John Mitchell, New York City.

"Make it a Red Cross Christmas!" is to be the recruiting slogan. Every one taking out a membership in the Red Cross during the drive period will be known as a "Christmas member." The effort practically will be limited to securing annual members, paying annual dues of $1, or $2 in the case of subscribing or magazine members.

During Red Cross week in June, the $100,000,000 mark set by the War Council was oversubscribed and gave assurance of a national interest in the Red Cross work which should make the Christmas membership drive fully as successful.

In New York City the campaign will be especially vigorous. The Red Cross membership here, instead of being the largest in the country, as it should be, is far behind the membership in towns where the population is less than half as large.

Division membership Christmas drive committees are to be selected by the division managers of the Red Cross, these committees to work under the general direction of the national committee. Each of the 3,000 or so Red Cross chapters also will appoint a committee to co-operate under the guidance of the respective division committees. The division committeemen will communicate with the Chairmen of all the chapters, in order to map out the campaign on local lines.

As this is the country's first Christmas in the world war, it is felt that the people will be thinking of service rather than festivities, and that minds generally will be turned to the battlefields of Europe, and especially to our own soldiers and sailors. It is believed, therefore, that the country will be in a frame of mind at Christmas time to give expression to all its anxiety and hope, by showing and renewing evidences of its support of the Red Cross.

An Appeal for Victrola Records.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A few of the thoughtful "folks back home" have had the kindness to send us a Victrola to help pass the quiet hours of the evening here in camp. We find ourselves short of records at present, and are taking the liberty to appeal to the folks back in old New York through THE TIMES. Any records will be acceptable, especially popular music, instrumental, and selections of all kinds. A little music furnishes a huge amount of diversion, and is a great help in dispelling gloom these cold nights.

SALESMEN—READ THIS FROM OUR RECORD FOR 1917.
Geo. A. has earned in first and deferred commissions over $14,000 the first six months of 1917—and this in his 62nd year. One fact like this is worth a thousand theories.
(Note.—At this point my secretary said: "Mr. Cerf, there is just one trouble about that statement—the commissions earned are so big they will defeat our purpose—people will doubt its accuracy." My answer was: "We have got the man, the receipts for commissions, and other men who have done better in the past. We will take a chance on that; for, remember, Wells, commissions as high as $50,000 have been made on a single sale in our line. Besides that, we are looking for topnotch men.")
If your record shows you have been a successful salesman at any time?
Wisdom would dictate that you connect yourself with a business that offers the greatest opportunity in the selling line.
The above record is not the result of accident—a wonderful company and the most efficient sales methods in modern times have combined to produce these results.
We can show you other instances equally interesting. Call on Mr. Meyers, care of L. A. Cerf, Manager, Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, 135 Broadway, New York.

BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES.

INVESTMENT.
An export company now doing a large and very profitable business, with offices in many countries, is increasing its capital stock. The money received therefor is to be used to take care of its increasing business, which is growing beyond all expectations.

In offering this stock to the general public we feel that we are extending an opportunity which is seldom offered to any one not in close touch with financial circles. It is a chance to become associated in business with the highest possible class of New York financial and business men, as our stockholders comprise leading banking and commercial interests. Our present stockholders would take up all of the new issue, but we have good reasons for wishing to scatter it. There are no insiders and no ground floor. Every share of preferred stock goes at the same price, with the same bonus of common.

We will give every opportunity for the fullest investigation as to condition, standing, personnel, &c. The new issue of stock is not large, and we prefer small investors with a minimum of one thousand dollars, with one exception. WATER SUPPLY EXTENSION.

Real Estate Board Favors Appropriation of $22,500,000.

The Real Estate Board of New York has filed the following statement in relation to the proposed appropriation of $22,500,000 for the Schoharie extension of the water supply:

"The Real Estate Board of New York appears in favor of the resolution offered by President Connolly of Queens Borough, requesting the Board of Water Supply to defer the award of contract for the Shandaken tunnel extension of the Schoharie Creek extension. The reasons given by President Connolly are compelling.

"Under the terms of the proposed contract the contractor does not begin work until after notice from the Board of Water Supply and then is given seven years to complete the work. It is an undoubted fact that the price of labor and the price of materials is at present so high that any contract awarded now would be for a sum far in excess of the amount that would be bid for similar work in normal times.

"At the time the appropriation of $22,500,000 corporate stock was made for this contemplated improvement the Real Estate Board called the attention of the Board of Estimate to the fact that no new source of water supply would be needed for twenty-five years. To award, therefore, a contract now at war prices for an improvement that will not be needed for twenty-five years seems a shameful waste of public money.

"Another reason given by President Connolly is an excellent one, and that is that all available labor is now needed for absolutely necessary work, and especially for work connected with National defense. No improvement of this character, unless immediately needed, should be entered into at the present time for this reason.

"The Real Estate Board, therefore, enters its hearty approval of the resolution and its opposition to any award at the present time for the building of the Shandaken Tunnel."

Definition of a Factory.

Justice Blackmar, sitting in the Appellate Division, Second Department, New York, in writing the opinion in the case of People vs. Stevens Company, Inc., says in part:

"The meaning of the word 'factory,' as defined in Section 2 of the labor law, was considered in Shannahan vs. Empire Engineering Corporation (204 N. Y., 543,) in which Judge Vann wrote as follows: 'A factory is a structure or plant where something is made or manufactured from raw or partly wrought materials into forms suitable for use. This is the primary definition which was extended by the statute so as to include any "mill, workshop, or other manufacturing or business establishments where one or more persons are employed at labor." The term "business establishment," as thus used, means one resembling a mill, workshop, or other manufacturing establishment. It is confined to things of the same general character as those names. It does not mean all business establishments where one or more persons are employed at labor, but only those engaged to some extent at least in manufacturing of some kind.'"

QUEENS BOROUGH BUILDING

Demand for Buildings and Apartments Far Exceeds Supply.

Superintendent John W. Moore of the Queens Building Bureau issued a statement last week concerning the building operations in Queens for the past ten months, and also commented upon the present outlook, which shows that, notwithstanding the adverse conditions ruling the building market, Queens has held her own with other boroughs of the city, and that the prospects are for large operations early in the year.

It was shown by these statements that for the past ten months there were a total of 3,079 applications for new buildings of an estimated cost of $9,980,608.

This was a net loss of about $5,000,000 in estimated cost over the operations of 1916 and a loss of about 800 in the number of buildings. Last year was one of the best in the history of the borough.

"The buildings that have been erected in Queens during the past year were only those that had to be erected, because of the pressing demand for additional accommodations," said Superintendent Moore.

"There were no builders looking for favorable places to locate and then erecting buildings on speculation. Had that been the case we would have a total more than double that recorded.

"The situation in Queens is that no person who builds is taking a chance, in so far as securing tenants is concerned. That applies to apartment houses, tenements, and loft buildings.

"Real estate men have urged builders in every section of the borough to go ahead with their plans for erection, saying that they cannot meet the demand that is being made for housing by those who want to make this borough their home.

"This demand is very heavy in the Long Island City, Corona, Maspeth, Jamaica, and Woodhaven districts, all sections which have benefited by the new transit lines that have been put into operation.

"In the Long Island City section the real estate men tell me that they have two and three applicants for every vacant apartment. Tenants are moving in just as soon as one leaves and the landlords are making repairs and redecoration and painting after the new tenants are in.

"The principal reason why builders will not go ahead is the high cost of building material. But even present prices would not hold building back if there was any assurance that prices now asked would continue for several years."

The operations for the past ten months, according to the report of Superintendent Moore, were as follows:

Month.	No. Bldgs.	Est. Cost.
January	252	$760,677
February	194	782,815
March	456	1,776,815
April	503	2,055,325
May	362	706,410
June	286	1,038,800
July	200	611,535
August	261	880,095
September	260	483,431
October	305	906,375
Total	3,079	$9,980,608

Queens Transit Meeting.

Public Service Commissioner Travis H. Whitney will speak at a special meeting, to be held under the auspices of the Queens Chamber of Commerce, in cooperation with the Civic and Business Men's Associations of the Third Ward, on Thursday evening, Nov. 22, at the League Building, Sanford Avenue, Flushing.

It is expected that Borough President Maurice E. Connolly will be present and speak. An invitation has also been extended to the officials of the Long Island Railroad.

One of the objects of the meeting is to assist the residents of the Third Ward in hastening action by officials of the city on the proposed lease of the Long Island Railroad tracks to give the benefits of the dual subway system to such communities as Flushing, College Point, Whitestone, Bayside, Douglaston, and Little Neck.

Milk Bottling Establishments.

In a unanimous decision of the Appellate Division, Second Department, New York, reversing a judgment of conviction of the Municipal Term of the Court of Special Sessions, it is held that an establishment for the pasteurization and bottling of milk is not a factory within the meaning of Section 2, labor law. (People v. Stevens Company, Inc. App. Div. Reports, V. 178, P. 306.) Reference is made in this case to a decision of the Court of Appeals (People ex rel Empire State Dairy Company v. Sohmer, 218 New York 199,) holding the the process of pasteurization does no constitute manufacturing.

The Rev. Antonio Cattoglio of Richmond has purchased from Hector Tripp Madison the plot 100 by 125 on the south side of Maryland Avenue west of Tompkins Avenue. J. Sterling Drake was the broker in the sale.

Westchester.

Fish & Marvin have purchased from the Randall estate a property on the station square at Pelham, N. Y., comprising five plots, on the corner of First Street and Corlies Avenue, together with an office building. The brokers have been tennants in the building, which has been used as a branch office.

Orange Apartment Sold.

Henry Miller and F. J. Hurd sold their new four-story brick apartment house at the northwest corner of Lenox Avenue and South Walnut Street, East Orange, on a plot 85 by 100, to Fred Lisiewski, President of the Eagle Brewing Company. The apartment has just been finished and is fully rented. The consideration is said to be $80,000. Joseph L. Feibleman & Co. negotiated the sale.

New Jersey.

Ernest C. Hinck of Montclair sold his Ocean Avenue, Seabright, N. J., property, with a frontage on the Atlantic Ocean of 175 feet and a frontage on the Shrewsbury River of about 300 feet. There are no buildings on the property, the residence having been destroyed by fire six months ago. The property was held at $10,000. William H. Hintelmann negotiated the sale.

John Reis, Vice President of the United States Steel Corporation, has purchased the residence and garage on the north side of Melrose Place, near Clinton Avenue, Montclair. The property formerly belonged to Miss Eleanor Peregrine and has been held at $55,000. F. M. Crawley & Brothers were the brokers in the sale.

Horace A. Bonnell of the Bonnell Motor Car Company purchased from the estate of Elizabeth L. Shaw the vacant plot at 39 to 47 Sussex Avenue, Newark, running from Boyden to Sheffield Street and having a frontage of 113 feet on Sussex Avenue, 217 feet on Boyden Street, and 191 feet on Sheffield Street, comprising about 25,000 square feet. A garage and service station will be erected on the site. Louis Schlesinger negotiated the transaction. The same broker also sold to Mrs. Minna Rudolf the frame dwelling at 349 Sumner Avenue, Newark, on a lot 25 by 106.

Commercial Leases.

Cross & Brown Company has leased the building, 35 by 100, at 527 West Twenty-third Street, to E. J. Widmer & G. Petersen for a long term of years.

J. Arthur Fischer has leased for S. May to Gruskin & Cohan, furriers, the store and basement at 640 Sixth Avenue for a term; also for Burton J. Berry to the United Construction Company, the store and basement at 353 West Thirty-ninth Street for three years, and to Truki Muksi, the store at 26 West Sixtieth Street for a Japanese restaurant and tearoom.

White-Goodman leased the five-story building at 158 Wooster Street to Joseph Friedman for a long term.

Lease Fifth Avenue Building

J. Grafton Minot of Boston has leased the five-story structure at 307 Fifth Avenue, between Thirty-first and Thirty-second Streets, to the Hamilton Garment Company, which now has offices in the building. The lease is for a long term of years and was closed by Pease & Elliman.

Right of Way for Water.

To supply water to the industrial plants gathering rapidly in the Meadows the New York and New Jersey Water Company has purchased a right of way ten feet wide extending from Pennsylvania Avenue to the Lincoln Highway in the Kearny section for two 30-inch mains. The purchase was made from the Newark Factory Sites Company.

LANDMARKS AT AUCTION.

The Fish Estate, Assessed at $1,714,000, Goes to Highest Bidder.

Despite the changes that have taken place in and about Astor Place, once the fashionable residential centre of Manhattan, the Fish family, descendants of Governor Peter Stuyvesant and Judith Bayard, his wife, and of Anna Stuyvesant and William Bayard, her husband, has held intact its share of "Petersfield" and the "Fish estate leaseholds." A few Fish estate sites have been reimproved, but the majority today have only land values.

Some years ago, in order the better to direct the interests of the Fish estate, the Hamilton Fish Estate was formed.

That corporation now has directed the public sale by Bryan L. Kennelly, auctioneer, on Wednesday next, Nov. 21, of sixty-five lots, plots, and buildings, assessed at $1,714,000, and situated in Broadway, Fourth Avenue, Third Avenue, First Avenue, Suffolk Street, East Ninth, Tenth, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Twentieth Streets.

The offering includes the greater part of the entire square block between Ninth and Tenth Streets, Fourth and Third Avenues, 650 Broadway, and the Fish Building, at the northeast corner of Fourth Avenue and Twelfth Street.

The Fourth Avenue block to be sold lies directly opposite the Wanamaker establishment and north of the Bible House, and has large speculative value, owing to the proposed extension eastward to Astor Place of the Hudson and Manhattan (New York and New Jersey) tunnel train service.

The Fish sale will dispose of a number of old city landmarks, many of which are capable of early improvement, and will go a long way toward arousing interest in a zone that, except for the Wanamaker activities, long has lain dormant, but to which the operation of the Broadway Subway is expected to prove of great benefit.

CUT INSURANCE RATES.

A Saving of Approximately $60,000 to Queens Property Owners.

The New York Fire Insurance Exchange last week adopted a resolution annulling and remitting the district advance on fire insurance rates in the First Ward of the Borough of Queens. All policies issued on or after Oct. 30, 1917, are affected by the ruling.

This will result in an annual saving of approximately $60,000 to the owners of fire insurance policies on all buildings, whether dwellings, stores, or factories, and to the owners of all fire insurance policies on furniture, fixtures, machinery, stock, and supplies. It will not only apply to present buildings and contents, but to all buildings erected in the future.

This additional charge or "direct advance" for fire insurance did not apply to any other section of Queens except Long Island City. By its removal, the Long Island City section is placed on exactly the same basis regarding fire insurance rates as the so-called "Metropolitan District."

The saving to the owners of industrial and mercantile buildings and to the owners of houses in Long Island City of every description is another accomplishment of the Chamber of Commerce of the Borough of Queens. Its Manufacturing and Industrial Committee has worked for the last four years to secure this reduction. It is understood that it will benefit the owners of 30,000 fire insurance policies, aggregating $45,000,000 of insurance.

When the matter was originally taken up by the Queens Chamber of Commerce with the New York Fire Insurance Exchange in 1914 an additional premium of 25 cents for each $100 of insurance was charged in certain parts of Long Island City and in other sections the additional premium was 15 cents per $100 of insurance.

On June 10, 1914, however, the New York Fire Insurance Exchange modified the rates so as to apply to all sections of Long Island City as follows: Fifteen per cent. additional charge on special rated risks, such as factory buildings, mercantile establishments, including machinery and stock; 10 per cent. additional charge on minimum rated risks, such as dwellings and stores, including furniture in same.

In the first instance, where an owner would pay only $1 in Manhattan he would pay $1.15 for the same insurance in Long Island City, and, under the second classification, $1.10.

Improved conditions have resulted both from the extension of the water mains of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity and through the Catskill water supply being available for Long Island City.

The tests of volume and pressure that were made on Oct. 30 proved entirely satisfactory, and favorable report was made to the New York Fire Insurance Exchange, which thereupon passed its resolution upon the application of the Queens Chamber of Commerce.

West Side Smoker.

Copeland Townsend, President of the Central Park West Civic League, will entertain 200 members of the association at a smoker in the Hotel Majestic on Thursday evening, Nov. 22.

It is planned to have an informal discussion regarding the improvement of real estate and traffic conditions on the west side under the new administration. Mayor-elect John F. Hylan, who has addressed the league on previous occasions, has been invited to be the guest of honor. He has tentatively accepted.

The Central Park West Civic League plans to secure a membership of 300 more real estate owners on the west side by March 1, and teams will be organized to canvass for members.

The Housing Problem.

Government homes for munition workers will require $100,000,000, American Federation of Labor officials said in a letter to President Wilson urging aid. There is no doubt in Defense Council circles today that a commission will be appointed shortly to solve the housing problem.

The housing shortage in munitions centres is so seriously interfering with war output that badly needed skilled men are forced away because lodging houses are running on triple shift and there is no place for a newcomer to sleep.

$50,000 Estate Sold.

John Crawford sold a shorefront estate at Southport, Conn., for Mrs. Edmund Guilbert to George O. May of Price, Waterhouse & Co. There are six acres of land fronting on Long Island Sound for 550 feet, a large modern dwelling, a garage, and a stable. The property was held at $50,000.

DEVELOPMENTS ON THE BOWERY FORECAST NEW AND VARIED BUSINESS EXPANSION

Municipal and Transit Improvements Attract Attention to Famous Thoroughfare—New Labor Exchange, Crockery, Electric Light, and Store Fixtures Districts Created—Demand for Modern Business Buildings Growing..

Four recent developments of strategic importance, potent with possibilities for the future of the Bowery, serve to attract attention once more to this important business thoroughfare.

First, the work on the new Manhattan Bridge Plaza at Canal Street is rapidly nearing completion. The bridge improvement not only will add to the general attractiveness of the Bowery but it will bring into Manhattan at this point a number of Brooklyn trolley lines now terminating at the other end of the bridge.

Second, the removal of the elevated pillars on the tracks from the sidewalk to the centre of the roadway has eliminated one of the most serious drawbacks to proper development.

Not only has it made walking less hazardous and annoying to pedestrians, but it has greatly improved the light and air of the affected buildings. The property owners were so overjoyed at the prospect of removing this nuisance that they waived their claims to damages which landlords elsewhere had been obtaining from the railroad on account of the third-tracking project.

Third, the installation of the third track and the inauguration of the all-day express service on the Third Avenue line, with stations at Chatham Square, Canal, Grand, Houston and Ninth Streets, have greatly improved transit facilities and made both property owners and tradesmen more optimistic.

Fourth, the Bowery within recent months has become one of the most important labor markets in the city and there is every indication that this phase of store occupancy will become a fixed institution. The number of employment agencies has steadily grown. The labor element in the population, which always had a tendency to congregate on the Bowery, perhaps on account of the great number of lodging houses, has since the beginning of the war continued to flock to this section.

Several of the agencies have taken space for a term of years, and those well informed on Bowery realty matters are of the opinion that the avenue will become the real market for labor in the United States.

New York City commercial expansion has been characterized chiefly by the creation of these trade districts, and more than one street has become distinctive by reason of the great number of occupants engaged in the same or kindred lines of business. So many labor exchanges have been established on the Bowery since the tremendous demand for labor has been created by the remarkable American industrial growth that the Bowery is beginning to be recognized as a growing centre from which labor may be recruited.

"All these developments," said Henry A. Schenck, President of the Bowery Savings Bank, "have contributed toward making the outlook for Bowery real estate more hopeful. The fact that there has been little selling activity recently does not necessarily indicate a lack of interest in properties in this section.

"In the first place, there has been a general hesitancy on the part of buyers to acquire realty in almost all parts of the city. Moreover, a great deal of Bowery holdings are owned by old estates, more or less entailed, whose parcels are virtually out of the market, except for leasing purposes."

"The substantial position which the Bowery holds in the confidence of both business men and wage-earners is perhaps best illustrated by its six financial institutions, consisting of three commercial banks, the Importers and Traders, the Germania, and the German Exchange, and the three savings banks, the Citizens', the Dry Dock, and the Bowery Savings.

"The three latter institutions alone control assets aggregating nearly $200,000,000. The depositors come from all parts of Greater New York and even from the suburbs and out-of-town points."

For years the Bowery has been trying to live down the unsavory reputation created during the days when its resorts were notorious throughout the world and its characters and environs provided a rich source for writers seeking new fields for literary exploitation.

Living down this reputation was no easy task. The very name was synonymous with vice. The spectre of its sordid past rose with almost irresistible power to check all efforts at regeneration. Passing years, however, brought a new generation, and with it reclamation for the Bowery.

The famous old avenue is becoming a business district with great possibilities. Even before the four great developments came to further revolutionize its future the commercial trend had become marked.

The Bowery is naturally adapted for business purposes. It is the New York terminus of the Manhattan Bridge and the Williamsburg Bridge, two great mediums of communication with Brooklyn, which bring over thousands of persons each day. Its unusual breadth also lends itself to commercial improvement.

Already store rentals in properties near the two great bridge approaches have felt the influence of this location. The confidence of retailers in the future stability of the Bowery for retail purposes is exemplified in the lease closed this week affecting store space in a building at Bowery and Hester Street, taken for a ten-year term, beginning in March, 1918, at a rental of $900 a year in excess of existing income return from the same sources.

The general decline in assessed valuations which has been noticeable within recent years in connection with Bowery properties has also to a considerable extent been checked. For the last two years assessments have remained stationary; in some instances advances have even been noted.

It is anticipated that as soon as the effects of the new improvements begin to manifest themselves and the realty market is re-established and rejuvenated the income-producing capabilities of Bowery store and loft properties will be impressed upon investors."

"One drawback to Bowery progress," declared George M. Adrian of the Michael J. Adrian Corporation, "has been a disinclination on the part of many owners to modernize their buildings and make them more attractive for occupancy.

"The structures which have been reimproved are so uniformly successful that it is surprising that more work has not been done along this line. Considerable impetus would be given to the Bowery reclamation movement if owners would capitalize the existing demand for space by modernizing their properties."

An important factor in the recent development of the Bowery has been the activity of the local association of property owners and merchants, known as the Manhattan Bridge Transit Improvement Association. Organized primarily to agitate the betterment of conditions at the Canal Street Plaza and to obtain better transit facilities over the Manhattan Bridge, it has extended its scope to include consideration of civic and taxpayer matters generally. It inaugurated some months ago the movement to change the name of the Bowery.

While this particular phase has been subordinated on account of more important and vital considerations confronting the citizens of New York, it has by no means died out. The association asserts that the development of the Bowery should not be hampered by the stigma attached to the old name.

It will be recalled that the proposal to change the name broached some months ago attracted city-wide and even nation-wide attention. The Omaha, (Neb.,) Bee, commenting upon it, said: "The evil reputation of New York's Bowery survives segregation, fumigation, and demolition. Business men in that locality propose the desperate operation of changing the name."

The Times Star of Cincinnati, Ohio, in a similar vein, said:

"We shall admit that through song and jest the Bowery has acquired a national reputation which cannot be regarded as a commercial asset. It has changed immeasurably since it first received its bucolic cognomen, Bouwerie, symbol of the farm and orchard. Its youth passed in rural innocence, city life proved too much for it. The Bowery became the social sewer of the metropolis. It has improved so much in late years that its present business interests are ashamed of its past."

But the Bowery, now a thriving business district, is successfully living down its dark past and its picturesque history wrapped up in the international notoriety of Suicide Hall, Nigger Mike, Gombossy's Music Hall, Sloppy May Mo-Nusty, Bat Sweeney, and Billy McGlory. These striking personalities and all they represented have passed into the realm of tradition.

The notorious dives and lodging houses have gone, many of them replaced with new or modernized living quarters, occupied by hard-working and decent laborers. Those who remain of the old element are slowly being crowded out by the sober and more self-respecting class of workingmen who have done so much to make "the Bowery as safe as Broadway."

The old-time barriers to the full realization of the Bowery's commercial possibilities have been and are being steadily eliminated.

The marked change in public opinion regarding the Bowery and the growing recognition of the efforts on the part of those interested in its future, coupled with the four great municipal, transportation, and economic improvements that have characterized its recent development, have combined in endowing the future with glowing possibilities.

"The future of the Bowery is remarkably bright from a business standpoint," declared Charles H. Shulman, who has property interests on the thoroughfare, and who is President of the Manhattan Bridge Transit Improvement Association. "This opinion is based on fact and not on fancy. The future of any business thoroughfare depends to a large extent upon traffic. The Bowery not only is a busy thoroughfare with regard to both vehicular and pedestrian traffic, but there is every indication that in the future traffic will be even greater in volume.

"Several weeks ago in an interview which I had with a representative of the Department of Plant and Structures, I was informed that the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company contemplated the creation of a terminal at the Bowery end of the Manhattan Bridge.

"As soon as the three loops now nearing completion are ready for occupancy several Brooklyn surface lines will be extended across the bridge. This must mean more traffic, and must eventually be reflected in greater real estate activity in the section to be immediately benefited, namely, the Bowery."

Hiram Rinaldo, a real estate broker established for many years in the district, also expressed his faith in the business future of the Bowery. "Besides the establishment of the new labor centre, there have been other important trade centres created," he said. "Stores on the west side of the Bowery have been taken by dealers in crockery and electric light fixtures, whereas considerable development has taken place on the east side of the thoroughfare in the absorption of space by dealers in new and second-hand furniture and store fixtures.

"Continued expansion depends to a great extent upon the local owners. I have no doubt that store and loft space on the Bowery will have no difficulty in attracting desirable and reputable tenants if modern and up-to-date conveniences are provided.

"Progressive business men will not became interested in ancient and dilapidated buildings. The course of owners is a clear one."

PERMANENT ORGANIZATION TO ADVANCE BUILDING INTERESTS

Contractors, builders, material dealers and credit men formed a permanent organization last week, having as its purpose the advancement of the building industry for the general welfare of New York City. The work of the association will be wide in scope and will cover a field not hitherto attempted, except spasmodically, by various individuals and associations identified with building.

A committee consisting of Elliott Smith of Candee, Smith & Howland, H. H. Murdock of Jardine, Hill & Murdock; C. J. Curtin of the Farnan Cheshire Lime Company, Arthur K. Mack of The Record and Guide, Allen E. Beals of the Dow Building Service and Franz Nielson of the Credit Association of the Building Trades of New York, were appointed to perfect the organization.

It is not the purpose of the new association to interfere in any way with individual organizations, but it has been felt for some time that if these various interests could co-operate to a far greater extent than is at present possible much good would result.

With this idea in mind the membership of the new association will include representatives from various organizations whose interests are in specific branches of the building industry, but without supplanting them.

Through co-operation with similar organizations in other cities, and with the National, State, and City Governments, improved conditions affecting materials, labor, transportation, mortgage loans, real estate, and other subjects relating to building, can be obtained, and legislation suggested which should better conditions generally.

The temporarily depressed state of the building industry in Greater New York prompted a recent mass meeting in the office of the President of the Borough of Manhattan. Out of this meeting a general committee and various sub-committees were appointed to study the subject from the several important angles of supply and demand of housing and other buildings, supply and demand of building loan and permanent mortgage money, supply and demand of labor, supply and cost of materials, and the bearing which the building laws and ordinances may have on the subject.

The various sub-committees as of one accord have realized that their studies, conclusions, and recommendations would be in vain unless a well-planned, modern, and permanent association was immediately formed to carry out the suggestions and findings through a wholehearted co-operation between all the interests engaged in this great industry, be they builders, financial institutions, capitalists, architects, general contractors, sub-contractors, material manufacturers, or others.

A member of the new organization said yesterday:

"Business men in a trade can no more proceed intelligently without joint study, mutual education, and united effort than an individual firm can progress without conferences between the members of the firm or the heads of departments. By the same token it is just as essential that an industry composed of a number of trades and interests be amalgamated and co-ordinated.

"It is through a concerted study of problems bringing about a well-balanced perspective of the relationship of one trade and interest to the other, and a standing together of all trades and interests for the adoption and carrying out of wise recommendations and policies that a true economic progress is to be made in the building industry.

"Important as were the disclosures brought to light in the recent mass meeting and in the deliberations of the respective committees regarding the present times upon which we have fallen, these serve merely to accent the outstanding fact that each one of the various conditions now somewhat a-killer is sure to return to normal, and then we shall be confronted by the question as to whether or not this great building industry will be in shape to meet the demands that will be made upon it.

"If there had been in past years, and still existed, an amalgamated association such as has just been formed, there would not have been need for the recent mass meeting; there would have been no confusing and dissimilar beliefs as to the causes of the momentarily depressed state; there would have been no placing by respective groups of the entire blame, one on the prices of materials, one on the high wages demanded by labor, one on the disinclination of the money interests to advance loans, one on transportation congestion, or on Government priority demands.

"On the contrary, the organization, through its respective committees, bureaus, and experts, would have known the true situation with respect to each stage of the past years. It would have recorded and would have published correct statements regarding the true facts and all interests, including the special buying public of our trades, would have maintained a continuous, true conception of the interrelated conditions.

"Each trade would have been assigned its proper station in the business battle, would have been told what course to pursue, oversupply of construction in some directions would have been controlled, and the undersupply in other directions would have been brought up to standard.

"The fundamental ills in the building business existed long before the present war and have only been made more graphic and more unbearable by the war. Many other industries within past years have gone through just such experience and each year has seen some new great industry added to those which have organized and formed permanent organizations, each with a wonderful machinery for the upbuilding of the trade and the education of the buying public patronizing the particular trade."

"From experience and observation in organizing other trades," said Franz Neilson at the meeting, "it is fundamental that the new association should have as its keynote the object of selling the building idea.

"The more people understand the building idea the more the timid capitalist learns of the true economy of building now as against waiting for the future, the more help he knows he can get from an organization in working out his building policies and plans, the more intelligent investors there will be in our field and the more intelligent will be the extension of our activities.

"If we can foster legitimate increase in demand for our output, if we can develop co-operative planning and execution of various methods leading to this result, and if we can encourage the harmonious and intelligent relations between the various interests, we will indeed go a long way toward establishing the industry in the highest confidence of the public and maintaining it as a vehicle for our future solidity and prosperity.

"We should be an intensively active organization with executive and active heads in our various bureaus. We should reach the buying public with building facts; we should reach supplying industries with a true knowledge of our demands, both present and prospective, and we should give to our own several divisions true pictures of what each can profitably do and what it would be unprofitable or unwise to undertake.

"Our organization should have a President who is disinterested, or perhaps we should say who is interested intensely, but commanding the confidence of the greatest number. We should have Vice Presidents representing the largest interests There should be a general manager and bureau secretaries; an Executive Committee should be made up of preferably a small, compact set of men of ability and resourcefulness who can work in effective team play and without being cumbersome; a Board of Directors or representatives from each of all the interests, no matter how small, yet with interests represented by members of the board in proportion to the number of individuals and firms engaged in the interests, due regard to be had to the importance of the respective interests.

"The association should engage in research work, and should collect and disseminate accurate building information, getting it officially, authoritatively, and interestingly before the public and the trades and interests taking up the industry."

Many of the leading industries were represented at the meeting last week, including building material supplies, brick, glass, cement, lime, terra cotta, investor and speculative builders, architects, real estate brokers, and others. The resolution forming a permanent organization was passed unanimously, and Elliott Smith, the Chairman, was instructed to appoint a Committee on Organization, which will interest organizations and associations in the movement, so that a representative body will be formed.

The Committee on Demand, Price, and Supply of Building Materials presented its final report, as did the Committee on the Demand for Buildings and the Committee on Supply and Price of Mortgage Money. These reports were accepted and filed for future reference.

ASTORIA OWNERS COMPLAIN

Realty interests representing investments of more than $2,000,000 in the Astoria section of Long Island City are preparing to make a most vigorous protest with the Public Service Commission and the Board of Estimate against the character of service on the Astoria elevated line of the dual system, which is operated by the Interborough Rapid Transit Company.

Those behind the movement will show that within the last three years they have spent several millions of dollars in the erection of high-class tenements and apartments, and have made the Astoria section one of the most important from an assessment point of view in Queens. At the present time they are threatened with loss of tenants because the apartments were projected on the promise of adequate transit facilities over the new lines.

It is asserted that only one line of transit is used from this section, that over the Queensboro Bridge connecting with the Second Avenue elevated line at Sixtieth Street. If there is a desire to use the subway system, and inconvenient transfer must be made at the Queensboro Bridge station in Long Island City. It is claimed that discrimination is shown in favor of the Corona section.

A mass meeting was held last Wednesday evening at Bohemian Hall, Astoria, where the protest of the real estate owners was vigorously supported. Well-known speakers made addresses and discussed the character of service. Among the speakers were George J. Ryan, President of the Queens Chamber of Commerce; Judge John Anderson Leach, Minor L. Platt, and Dr. J. J. Kindred.

GODWIN ESTATE PARTITION.

Low Prices Predicted at Big Sale of Lots.

There is much speculation among brokers, operators, and investors as to what the Godwin estate holdings in the historic Kingsbridge section will bring when offered at public auction on Tuesday, Nov. 27, in the Vesey Street salesroom, by Joseph P. Day and J. Clarence Davies.

The consensus of opinion is that they will go at bargain prices, despite the fact that the sub-division of the Godwin property has been awaited for many years by builders and land speculators in the Bronx. Some of these have died waiting, after having seen the Bronx grow from a village to one of the largest "cities" in the United States. For all practical purposes, however, it is perhaps better that the estate was not sold while Kingsbridge was just beginning to find "its place in the sun."

The 234 lots to be sold include a number of the most historic sites in the Kingsbridge region and control a number of intrinsically valuable frontages, of greatly varying depth, in Broadway, 230th Street, and 231st Street, Kingsbridge Avenue, Bailey Avenue, Albany Crescent, Exterior Street, the Putnam Railroad right of way, Godwin Terrace, Kimberly Place, Putnam Place, and Ververlen Place, including also the parcel containing about ten lots at the junction of Broadway, Exterior Street, and West 230th Street.

A subway station in Broadway at 231st Street is at the property and another is at 225th Street, (Marble Hill.) These are about equidistant from the most southerly lots included in the Godwin estate.

NEGRO APARTMENTS.

Six Completely Rented Harlem Houses in Successful Experiment.

An interesting experiment in negro housing in this city has just been completed through the entire renting of a group of high-class Harlem multi-family structures, taken over last September, when they were occupied by white tenants.

A total of 306 apartments in the six modern buildings at 117 to 145 West 141st Street and 130 to 146 West 142d Street has been rented to negro families, including a number of men prominent in professional and business fields.

Among the well-known negroes who have taken apartments in the buildings are James D. Carr and Walter J. Conway, lawyers; V. W. Tandy, an architect; Al Johns, the musician; John Clark, active in negro social welfare work, and Alger Campbell, Benjamin Withers, Earl Theodore and F. O. Stratton, physicians.

They are paying rentals averaging about $8.50 a room for apartments ranging in size from three to six rooms, which is the same rental that prevailed in the days of white occupancy.

Last August a sensation was created in Harlem by the announcement that the six houses had been sold by the 135 Broadway Holding Corporation to Edward C. and W. H. C. Brown, negro capitalists of Philadelphia.

The surrounding property, even as far north as 143d Street and Eighth Avenue, had already begun to be taken over for negro occupancy, but high-class elevator apartments had heretofore been able to resist effectually the influx of this class of tenants.

While one or two buildings of this type had been taken over by negro tenants, namely, The Argyle, in West 131st Street, and another at Lenox Avenue and 137th Street, these were in the centre of the big colony whose hub was at Lenox Avenue and 135th Street, and represented the older types of construction.

It was generally felt that the newer and more modern buildings in 141st Street and 142d Street, on account of the substantial character of the white tenancies and their superior rent-paying power, would restrict to some degree the steady expansion of the negro district.

The subsequent lease of the six buildings in these streets to the Philton Holding Company, headed by the late Philip A. Payton, Jr., negro real estate broker in Harlem, and the statement that they would be available for colored families, amounted practically to an ultimatum to the white tenants, who almost immediately began to seek new homes.

Aside from this element in the transaction, the deal had additional significance in that it represented an important advance in the movement to better negro housing conditions in the city. The houses were modern in every detail, with elevators and telephone service, and compared favorably with the best that Harlem could offer in the apartment house field.

Interest in the move was intensified by the raising of the rent schedules to $9 and $10 a room, recording an advance over previous rents paid by the white tenants.

A number of Harlem brokers expressed doubt that such a venture could be successfully launched, on account of the rather limited resources of the average colored tenant. It seemed for a time that this judgment proved sound, since renting proceeded very slowly and only a third of the apartments in the six buildings were taken.

Payton, the moving spirit in the project, died before the real result of the experiment could be determined, and in September Watt Terry, a wealthy negro investor of Brocton, Mass., acquired both the fee and the leasehold.

He had long been a student of negro housing and determined to put into practice the theories which he held. The rent schedule was reduced to the present scale and leasing became brisk. He has succeeded in attracting to the buildings tenants well to do enough to pay the rents called for and required to place the properties on a good income-producing basis.

The absorption of all the available space in high-grade apartment houses of this type has stimulated to no small degree the steadily broadening movement for better housing conditions among the negroes of New York.

"The manner in which responsible people have rented these apartments," said Llewellyn C. Collins, general manager of the buildings, "indicates clearly how they appreciate the opportunity that has been afforded for obtaining space of the better grade.

"In my opinion this move has now passed out of the experimental stage and its success is assured."

Home for Aged in Bronx.

A $350,000 home for the aged will be erected in Bronx Borough, on the Grand Boulevard and Concourse, 166th to 167th Street. Plans are being prepared by J. H. Freedlander and Harry Allen Jacobs.

REVIEW OF REAL ESTATE MARKET

Strong Demand for Commercial Properties Shown in Both Sales and Leases.

OLDER SECTIONS ACTIVE

Trading in Small Holdings Characterizes Investment Dealing—Element of Exchange.

Sales and leases of commercial properties were actively identified with the week's realty market, which displayed marked broadening tendencies. An encouraging feature of the business was the scattered demand, which did not concern itself with any particular section of the city, the older downtown districts being as well represented as the newer midtown territory.

Leading sales of the week concerned Yorkville landmarks to be demolished for a modern business improvement, a First Avenue blockfront occupied by a garage, and a Greenwich Street corner which will provide the site for a large warehouse project.

The investment demand for well-located income-producing properties was manifested by the acquisition of valuable apartment house properties on the west side, notable on Riverside Drive, West 144th Street and Jumel Terrace.

Theatre properties, which have been figuring more or less prominently in the business of recent weeks, were also involved in two important deals. The owners of the Colonial Theatre, near Lincoln Square, enlarged their holdings near that point and on Washington Heights; a theatre and store property passed into the hands of a new owner, who gave Bronx flats in exchange.

Smaller properties in other sections of Manhattan and the Bronx figured in similar transactions, the trade element also being conspicuous.

Midtown property owners were interested in the report that a new club was in process of organization, which contemplated locating in the Fifth Avenue section. The new association will mark an important addition to the group of clubs which have established themselves in this vicinity and which have added so materially in establishing the international prestige which Fifth Avenue enjoys.

The leading commercial lease of the week concerned a valuable corner on Broadway in the Times Square district, which will be reimproved for the occupancy of the Regal Shoe Company. The lease, involving an aggregate rental of nearly $1,500,000, takes on additional value on account of the standing of the tenant and the significance of so important an addition to the group of high-class retailers who are acquiring space along this part of Broadway.

At Astor Place, the former house of Brokaw Brothers also figured in an interesting lease which brings further north a large tobacco company long established on Grand Street. A mercantile building on Leonard Street passed into the possession of a silk and cotton converting concern, now on Third Street. The latter lease is of especial interest because it is contrary to the recent uptown trend which has characterized so many business removals and which has resulted in the general shift of trade north, rather than south.

The downtown section in the immediate neighborhood affected by this lease expects to feel at an early time the benefits of the operation of the new Canal Street crosstown subway. The availability of so many buildings for business occupancy, coupled with the convenient shipping facilities, forecasts a marked revival of interest in properties in that locality.

Further north the old retail shopping area, which has been converted into a manufacturing centre, continued to attract into the former department store holdings clothing wholesalers.

MARK TWAIN AS A LETTER WRITER

Two Volumes of Hitherto Unpublished Correspondence Full of Delightful Self-Revelations and Noble Friendships

By BRANDER MATTHEWS

MARK TWAIN'S LETTERS, ARRANGED WITH COMMENT BY ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE. Two volumes. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers.

FIVE years ago Mr. Albert Bigelow Paine published his monumental life of Mark Twain, one of the very best of modern biographies, solidly authenticated by laborious research, immitigably honest, setting down naught in malice, instinct with the desire to tell the truth and nothing but the truth. In that book he made constant use of Mark Twain's correspondence, selecting judiciously and quoting from the letters not so much for their own sake as to illuminate characteristics of his subject. Now he has collected two solid volumes of Mark Twain's correspondence, which he has arranged chronologically and which he has elucidated by a running commentary, always modest, always unobtrusive, and always confined to the strictly necessary explanations. In other words, he has let Mark Twain, the letter writer, speak for himself. It is difficult to see how this work could have been done more discreetly or more tactfully.

Mark Twain, in spite of his abiding boyishness, which was continually tempting him into exuberant outbreaks, had an unusual gift for friendships; and these two volumes are a record of noble and enduring friendships. It is true that he had permanent disagreements with Bret Harte and Edward H. House and John T. Raymond. But he bound Howells and H. H. Rogers to him with hooks of steel; and his association with Aldrich and Twitchell, Warner and Gilder, Charles Warren Stoddard and George W. Cable was almost as intimate and as unclouded. The sympathy between Goethe and Schiller, or that between Carlyle and Emerson was not finer or more beautiful than that between Mark Twain and Howells. In these volumes Mr. Paine has given us two or three score of Mark's letters to Howells and only a scant half dozen of Howells's letters to Mark. We want them all; and it is to be hoped that their correspondence will be printed in full, and by itself, sooner or later.

Mark Twain was a marvelous talker; and he was also a marvelous letter writer, because he wrote letters as if he were merely talking to the friend from whom he chanced to be separated. These letters are never composed with any thought of publication; they are never labored; they are always easy; they are sometimes even free and easy. They are the spontaneous expression of the man himself as he happened to be at the moment of taking pen in hand. In the shortest of them as in the longest he is unmistakably himself, setting down in black and white his thoughts and his feelings as they surged up naturally, and assured that the recipient would supply the understanding needed for their complete appreciation. They are highly individual; they abound in whim, in humorous exaggeration, in imagination, and in energy. They are delightful reading, in themselves in the first place, and in the second as revelations of the character and the characteristics of Mr. Samuel L. Clemens, who was in some ways a different person from Mr. Mark Twain known to all the world.

Of course, the earlier letters, written in his boyhood and youth to his mother, his sister, and his brother, are what might be expected in the correspondence of a fledgling author who ripened slowly and who did not discover himself and come into his own until he was 30. Indeed, most of these missives of his immaturity are not only flavorless, but quite without any promise of the later mastery of the accomplished man of letters which their writer was to become. Only in the course of years did he acquire the command of style—the nervous directness, the pungent vitality, the instinct for the unerring adjective and for the inevitable noun—which became his in the course of time and which revealed itself first in the unforgettable description of the Sphinx in the "Innocents Abroad"—to be matched later by the superb account of the Jungfrau in "A Tramp Abroad."

Those belated readers who may even now think of Mark Twain as a mere fun-maker, to be classed carelessly with John Phoenix and Artemus Ward and Josh Billings, will find in these letters cause to revise their hasty judgment and to recognize the depth and nobility of Mark Twain's nature. A humorist he was from the beginning to the end; but at the end humor was no longer the dominant element in his work. He made men laugh as no one else was able to do so abundantly in the final twoscore years of the nineteenth century; but his laughter was never forced or trivial or accidental. His humor was rooted in and flowered out of a deep and abiding melancholy; and at the end of his life he was as serious and as sad at heart as Swift or Cervantes or Molière. His tenderness is beautifully displayed in the letters to his wife, of which Mr. Paine allows us to read only a few, simple and sincere in their direct expression of a love which began at first sight and which grew steadily with the years.

As these years passed he was stricken again and again. His only son was taken from him in infancy. Then his eldest daughter died; and what her loss meant to him can be seen from a letter (Page 641) to Mr. Twitchell, in which he laid his heart bare before his friend. Then Mrs. Clemens was snatched away at last after protracted periods of hopeless invalidism. Finally his youngest daughter died in her turn; and there is unspeakable pathos in the letter he then wrote to his sole surviving child, (Page 835.)

It is only on occasion and to the members of his own family that the deeper aspects of the man are disclosed. For the most part the letters deal with surface of life and with the experiences of the moment. Many of them have a reckless and joyous exaggeration—as in that which he wrote to Mr. Twitchell (Page 666) and which was called forth by an article of mine. One paragraph in this, expressing violently his distaste for the ivory miniatures of Jane Austen, was so vehement that Mr. Paine has decorously edited out the most picturesque of its phrases. But its purport can be guessed at from another paragraph in another letter, in which he expresses his wonder why the contemporaries of Jane Austen "allowed her to die a natural death!" Mr. Paine prints without any editing two similar but less vehement letters to me, written after Mark had been reading several of Scott's novels with increasing dissatisfaction, relieved only after he had come to "Quentin Durward" and after he had found that bravura romance more to his liking. These two letters (Pages 737-8) are very like the articles he wrote on "Fenimore Cooper's Literary Offenses," and in these letters and in that article he reveals his critical insight, his fundamental honesty, which was continually compelling him to read the accredited authors of the past with his own spectacles and to apply his own standards of judgment. He has no reverence for a classic which cannot prove its right to be received as a classic. But while he has the insight of a true critic, he lacks the balance that true criticism demands. Most of the blemishes he dwells on in the stories of Scott and Cooper are there for all to see; yet there are counterbalancing beauties which Mark failed to perceive, or at least to acknowledge.

Here again he discloses his eternal boyishness, so to call it, which is one of his most marked characteristics. A great part of the merit of "Tom Sawyer" and of "Huckleberry Finn" is due to his ability to recapture the temper of his own boyhood with its eagerness of self-assertion and with its youthful intolerance. As he wrote in a letter (given on Page 566): "I conceive that the right way to write a story for boys is to write so that it will not only interest boys but will also strongly interest any man who has ever been a boy; that immensely enlarges the audience." He was himself a man who could never forget that he had been a boy himself—a man who could and did retain an ever fresh boyishness of outlook and of attitude.

It was perhaps this eternal boyishness which led him sometimes to answer a foolish or an indiscreet letter with a volcanic frankness which relieved his own feelings at the time, but which was entirely disproportionate to the offense he had received. And it was his natural kindliness which induced him not to send this letter (Page 475) and to substitute for it a colorless and commonplace acknowledgment less likely to arouse resentment.

Now that I have endeavored to describe the House of Fame that Mr. Paine has erected to the memory of Mark Twain as a letter writer, it may be well for me to submit a few specimen bricks that the reader of this review may see for himself a little of the material out of which the stately edifice has been built. Here, for example, is a characteristic passage from a letter sent to Helen Keller, when she had been annoyed by one of those futile and foolish accusations of plagiarism brought by somebody with a mania for uncovering mares' nests:

> Oh, dear me, how unspeakably funny and owlishly idiotic and grotesque was that "plagiarism" farce! As if there was much of anything in any human utterance, oral or written, except plagiarism! The kernel, the soul—let us go further and say the substance, the bulk, the actual and valuable material of all human utterances—is plagiarism. For substantially all ideas are second-hand, consciously and unconsciously drawn from a million outside sources, and daily used by the garnerer with a pride and satisfaction born of the superstition that he originated them; whereas, there is not a rag of originality about them anywhere except the little discoloration they get from his mental and moral calibre and his temperament, and which is revealed in characteristics of phrasing. When a great orator makes a great speech you are listening to ten centuries and ten thousand men—but we call it his speech, and really some exceedingly small portion of it is his. But not enough to signify. * * * No doubt we are constantly littering our literature with disconnected sentences borrowed from books at some unremembered time and now imagine to be our own, but that is about the most we can do. In 1866 I read Dr. Holmes's poems, in the Sandwich Islands. A year and a half later I stole his dictation, without knowing it, and used it to dedicate my "Innocents Abroad" with. Then years afterward I was talking with Dr. Holmes about it. He was not an ignorant ass—no, not he; he was not a collection of decayed human turnips, like your "Plagiarism Court"; and so when I said, "I know now where I stole it, but whom did you steal it from?" he said, "I don't remember; I only know I stole it from somebody because I have never originated anything altogether myself, nor met anybody who had."

Rudyard Kipling wrote to a friend that

> I love to think of the great and godlike Clemens. He is the biggest man you have on your side of the water by a damn sight, and don't you forget it. Cervantes was a relative of his.

And when this was transmitted to Mark, he wrote:

> It makes me proud and glad—what Kipling says. I hope fate will fetch him to Florence while we are there. I would rather see him than any other man.

And earlier in the same acknowledgment Mark had

THE GREEN MIRROR. A Quiet Story. By Hugh Walpole. New York: George H. Doran Company.

MR. WALPOLE'S new novel, the second in a trilogy of which "The Duchess of Wrexe" was the first, was written before the war, was finished, he says in the dedicatory note, in August, 1914, and revised the following year. Its action takes place fifteen years ago, and therefore the England with which it deals is dead and gone more completely than the England of any former age changed and disappeared in a hundred years. Perhaps of all the countries engaged in the great war none, not even Russia, will be changed in spirit more deeply and more thoroughly than England. Even now, absorbed as the English are in their mighty and determined struggle, they begin to see, from highest to lowest, that they and their nation will come out from the years of trial very different. Wrote an officer of the valiant Canadians to his friends at home after two years of service at the front: "I hope this war will last until the class system in England is shot so full of holes that it can never lift its head again." And he added his belief that the death wounds had already been received. But, if they have, they are not, apparently, the only death-dealing blows that have fallen upon national characteristics in the mother isle of nations. Mr. Walpole seems to send forth his new novel with some doubt, trembling, he says in the note of dedication, that it will "appear slow in development and uneventful in movement, belonging in style and method and subject to a day that seems to us already old-fashioned." But he goes on to say that "I cannot feel my book to be quite old-fashioned when the love of England, which I have tried to make the text of it, has in many of us survived so triumphantly changes and catastrophies and victories that have shaken into ruin almost every other faith we held."

The England of which his book tells, fifteen years ago, the intensest, innermost, most thoroughly British heart of England, was already beginning to feel some stir of coming change, a change that is typified in the story by the shattering of "the green mirror." There was never a more thoroughly British family than that of the Trenchards, with whose affairs during one year Mr. Walpole is concerned. In the drawing room of their stolid, uncompromising London home hung an old mirror that reflected everything in the shabby room with its old green carpet and green walls, so that it seemed to gather up and hold in soft miniature not only the room but all the national soul of England.

Mr. Walpole is almost merciless in his treatment of the faults and foibles of that soul—or he would be if he were not also loving and tender and reverent. He embodies in it the members of the Trenchard family, dissects it to its ultimote atoms, understands it and all that it has meant in the life of England, analyzes and discusses it, paints it in colors that he knows must be repellent to those who are not of it, but which, just because they are and have been for centuries a part of the soul of England, have for him a certain sweetness and sacredness. But, without any doubt, when Mr. Walpole wrote this novel in those dead years before the war he was engaged, quite consciously to himself, in the task of flaying, gently and tenderly and lovingly, it is true, but still flaying with satire the heart and soul of his native land. And he has done the task with such neatness and dexterity and completeness, and also with such tenderness, that the work itself fills the reader with interest and its artistic performance with satisfaction.

In the members of the Trenchard family Mr. Walpole has embodied all of those distinctively British characteristics that have always exasperated the rest of the world. They are selfish and self-centred—their attitude is "Nothing happens that doesn't happen to us"; they are unimaginative, insular, self-sufficient, supremely indifferent to everything in the world that does not in some way concern the Trenchard connection. Mrs. Trenchard is a personified British matron, inflexible, dominant, a bit stupid, fiercely maternal, and, altogether, a rather terrible sort of person. This British matron kind of character seems to have a fascination for Mr. Walpole, because of the havoc it can work in other people's lives. His Duchess of Wrexe was one of them, and in this book appears for a brief and unimportant hour her son, glad to have been freed by her death from her ruthless, dominating personality. The mother, long dead, of Philip Mark, the hero of this story, occasionally still casts a sinister shadow over his life, having irretrievably weakened his character by her imposition upon his youth of her ideas, her standards, her will.

But the British matron meets with her Waterloo in this new novel in which she makes a ruthless, carefully worked out, determined effort to force submission to her purpose on the part of all her family. The breath of another dawn has already begun to blow and the young people of the new generation are beginning to be restless, to want to feel their own individualities, to live their own lives. They do not know it yet, but they are almost ready to revolt against the Trenchard tradition, to believe that people may be of interest and consequence and not be Trenchards, to entertain the idea that other countries may not be entirely outside the pale when compared with England. Then into the circle comes Philip Mark, a young Englishman who has lived for some years in Russia, whose embryonic imagination has been developed in that country, who has ideas and feelings and sentiments that are disconcertingly un-English, that disturbingly suggest a region where Trenchards are not known. He is resented, considered with disapproval and dislike. But he and the eldest daughter of the family fall in love with each other and the drama of the tale grows out of the determination of Mrs. Trenchard that he shall not become one of them, or, if he persists in marrying Katherine, that he must be devoured utterly by what one might call Trenchardism. He must, if he is to be her son-in-law, be dominated by her and have his life colored, infused, ruled by the Trenchard spirit. And he knows that that would mean the death of his soul. So a quiet duel goes on between them, with Katherine wishing for his success, but unable until the end to take sides against her mother.

Henry Trenchard, Katherine's younger brother, who is an awkward, sentimental, self-conscious, generally disagreeable lad in his last teens, stands out rather prominently and very clearly in the story, is the same Henry Trenchard who a dozen years later in his life appeared as the hero of Mr. Walpole's previous novel, "The Dark Forest." Here he is seen "in the making," and showing, notwithstanding his many disagreeable qualities and his sadder moods, occasional promise of his later development.

But underneath all these repellent characteristics one sees, and that is where Mr. Walpole reveals the depth and truth and tenderness of his insight, that the root of them all is, after all, the love of England. And it is that love that is now saving England and helping to save civilization.

THREE'S A CROWD

THREE'S A CROWD. By William Caine. Houghton Mifflin Company.

HERE is a story that has the familiar mother-in-law theme for mainstay, and an Anglo-American marriage as a side show. The mother-in-law is very objectionable in a hectic, desperately devoted to her daughter, manner. She and the girl are Americans, and the man is an English painter of portraits.

The book is curiously superficial. Never for a moment are we at grips with anything more real than the author's opinions and judgments. He constantly plays the showman, with the result that his characters are puppets. Agreeable and amusing puppets, several among them, with a turn for a wit at times, not to mention an astonishing power for long flights of speech. On several occasions one or other among them holds forth uninterruptedly to the extent of several pages, and always at moments when the action is tense, and the possibility of contradiction or enraged interjection imminent. It reads rather like the work of a clever amateur, cultivated and observant, with all the time in the world on his hands, and a facility for fluent expressions, than a book by any one to whom the term professional novelist could be ascribed.

This is not to say that it is not entertaining reading. The beautiful American, exquisite from her crown of shining golden hair down to her presumably small feet, though these fail of mention, is a very good specimen of the spoiled girl, the pet of her parent and the object of all young men's adoration and slavish service. She has no conception of the realities of life nor of that special reality, the value of money. She is a good girl, but a silly one, and her silliness and lack of any training lead her into some difficulty. This leading is engineered by her mother with energy and determination, she being a sentimental egoist with a common streak in her and what might be called a gooey type of conversation, except when she launches out into invective.

Everything happens as you know it will. There is never an instant of uncertainty in the whole book. The best friend of the husband who falls in love with the wife is here, rich and titled to the extent of being a Baronet, and according to tradition he goes to Africa to kill lions and elephants as a relief to his feelings. It is interesting to ponder upon how many of these fierce beasts have untimely bit the dust because of the hopeless or misguided love of young Englishmen—at least in novels. This particular Baronet returns uncured, but later on his cure appears to be accomplished by the far simpler expedient of a talk with the lady, during which she makes it clear that she would rather live with than without her husband.

But in spite of being somewhat hackneyed, the partial study of the character of the mother is marred by the desperate resolve of the author to maintain the light and playful touch at all hazards, for is the book not described as a comedy? In spite of the fact that he refuses to be serious even in his conception of the persons in his story, the mother is interesting. She is almost real, almost alive, and she is a type that would be worth more thorough treatment.

"For one thing at least Mr. Caine merits unstinted praise, and that is the dialogue which he puts into the mouths of his Americans. It is the sort of dialogue an American could use without strain, and which he has no trouble in understanding. This, from an English writer, is a remarkable fact.

The book will prove light, pleasant enough, and a complete escape from anything having to do with the war. It might have been written in 1913, so untouched it is by recent events, the ease and celerity with which the characters rush back and forth across the Atlantic alone placing it far indeed from today, giving it almost a quaint air of passed times and older ways, before the Hun had dipped his bloody hands into the clean brine of the seas.

THOMAS KELLY

THE WORLD AND THOMAS KELLY. By Arthur Train. Charles Scribner's Sons.

THOMAS KELLY was an extraordinarily fortunate youth. On at least two occasions some occurrence which was purely an act of fate saved him from making a complete mess of his life, and that in the very nick of time. Moreover, he finally won the ideal young woman with whom the author apparently intends us to believe that he had always been in love, despite his temporary desertion. And what she wanted with him is a profound mystery. There is, however, at least one moment in the book during which the reader is entirely in accord with Thomas Kelly—the moment when he declares that he has been "a miserable, low-down cad."

The book begins at a very early period in its hero's life; to be exact, on the very day of his birth. This—for him—important event took place in Boston during the 80s. His father and mother, though "of Boston, were not precisely in it" from a social standpoint, and Tom's boyhood was not of the most cheerful. While he was still a baby his father died, and he was brought up by his mother, a timid, pious, and exceedingly worthy lady, assisted by her very unattractive relations. Presently he went to Harvard, where he found himself an outsider, obliged to associate with outsiders, until he discovered an effective trick serve, "the egg," which won him the tennis tournament, and gave him a chance to distinguish himself at the International at Newport. From being an outsider, he suddenly found himself a member of one of the best of the Harvard clubs, and invited to come to Newport as the guest of one of his classmates. So to Newport he went, and became very popular; why, the reader is at a loss to understand. Mr. Train, it would seem, intended his hero to have a good deal of charm, but for some reason has omitted to endow him with an atom of that most desirable quality.

The first part of the novel is by all odds the best. The picture of Tom's rather drab boyhood is well drawn, and the account of his college days, his consciousness of being left out of the fun and the good-fellowship, and his loss of balance when at last fortune smiles on him, is quite real. But from the moment he starts for Newport the interest of the story—like its merit—steadily declines, until it reaches the vanishing point, which place it attains many pages in advance of the last chapter. The material of this part of the book is worn threadbare from much use, and there is no freshness in viewpoint, in manipulation, or in character drawing to make it entertaining.

SMITHS IN WAR TIME

THE SMITHS IN WAR TIME. By Keble Howard. John Lane Company. $1.40 net.

WITH all due and proper respect to Shakespeare, and the many lesser writers who have upheld the principle of "love at first sight," it must be admitted that such a proceeding is not without its dangers and its disadvantages. It is, however, quite possible to fall in love at first reading, and that with entire comfort and safety. So we may admit without shame or hesitation to an immediate fondness for that dearest of dear old couples, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Smith of Valley View, Surbiton, England. Mr. Smith is a youthful person—the adjective is used in all sincerity—who has lived in this world for seventy-one well-spent years; his charming wife is, according to the calendar, a little younger; and the book tells what happened to this delightful and patriotic couple in war time.

First, Mr. Smith suddenly decided that he had no right to be so very comfortable as he was, when "millions of brave soldiers are up to their necks in mud!" Mrs. Smith, who exercised a mildly restraining influence on her energetic and impulsive husband, reminded him that they had bought practically nothing since the beginning of the war, also that the soldiers were "not quite up to their necks, dear!" Nevertheless, Mr. Smith insisted that they must let Valley View furnished, live more cheaply, and give the difference to the Red Cross and the War Loan.

Their subsequent experiences with house agents and in Pilot Cottage are very funny, indeed. They did not, however, curb Mr. Smith's patriotic ardor. He did so intensely want to do his bit, and something more! And so presently he became "Private Grandpa." Later he tried the experiment of putting the entire household—including "Cook"—on a military basis, tried meatless days, and endeavored to enter for "National Service," because, although by this time two years had passed and he was 73, he "felt 60"—60 being the age limit. Unsuccessful in this, he emerged triumphant from an encounter with a special constable, who actually dared to impeach his patriotism—his, Ralph Smith! But his great trial was still to come; for one day his dearly loved grandson, Flight Lieutenant George Smith, was reported "missing." And then he learned of how those others felt, "men he had known for years," who "would never again look upon the faces of their eldest sons. He saw them go by, morning after morning—heads up, coats neatly buttoned, umbrellas neatly rolled * * * the last ten minutes had shown him the bleeding hearts of those 'ordinary' men."

The book is written with a thoroughly delightful mixture of humor and pathos; if we laugh at Mr. Smith, it is very tenderly, and we are all the fonder of him for his whimsies and absurdities, just as his wise, sweet wife was. They are people we are glad to know, quiet, simple, human, "ordinary," and very lovable people, with something big and fine in them, underneath it all—the something which enables Mr. Smith at the last to see and to express the responsibility which will rest upon all those who survive the war; the responsibility of making it certain that the awful sacrifice shall not be in vain.

A PRINCESS OF MARS

A PRINCESS OF MARS. By Edgar Rice Burroughs. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.35.

THE author of this astounding romance is famous for spinning wonder tales about strange and terrible creatures. Now he peoples Mars with a race of fearful giants, who have six appendages themselves, ten-legged watchdogs, and ferocious horses. To this wild country, to this people who die only in reckless combat or by a voluntary journey down the river of death, comes one John Carter, who falls asleep in an Arizona cave and wakes up dead—or alive on Mars. Mysterious as are the green-skinned Martians to him, is this pigmy human to them, but by his valorous conduct and his prowess he wins their respect and a limited freedom. But war is the life of Mars, and from the beginning to the end the book is a tale of battles: between the earth man and the Martians, or with the fierce beasts of this awful planet, but centring mainly about a woman. This woman, Dejah Thoris, (the names of the various inhabitants and their animals are not the least fascinating feature in the story,) is a Princess of Helium; no fearsome creature, who takes her amusement in the torture of her victims, but a copper-skinned, black-haired beauty, captured by the Green Martians and adored by their human comrade. The warfare in which John Carter, alias Dotar Sojat, frequently is forced to take part is complicated by all that is wonderful on Mars. Like the children of Plato's Republic, none knows his own father, and the one female Martian (she could scarcely be described as a woman) who does know her parentage is considered a weakling by her companions, and is, in fact, Carter's aid in his combats.

There is a certain amount of comfort to be got out of a tale that, while it treats of monstrous cruelties and terrifying strife, is yet so remote from earthly war as to be agreeably unreal. Aside from this satisfaction, the story has the interest attaching to any romantic speculations, and the narrative itself is fairly smooth and full of excitement.

PAULINA

THE ENLIGHTENMENT OF PAULINA. By Ellen Wilkins Tompkins. E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50 net.

THIS new novel is one of those books which one reads with a feeling of regret—regret for what they might have been. For there is some good work in "The Enlightenment of Paulina," but it is rendered almost null and futile by the author's apparent lack of any sense of light and shade, any sense of what to eliminate. Vigorous blue-penciling and pulling together might have made an interesting novel out of what, as it now stands, is a very tedious one. Paulina herself, especially in the opening part of the story, is well drawn; as the tale advances she steadily becomes less interesting.

The backbone of the plot is the familiar theme of the woman who, married to one man, falls in love with another. Paulina, the heroine, is a woman who has had anything but an easy life. Indeed, one cannot help thinking that almost any iniquity should be forgiven one who had been so unfortunate as to have the Rev. Lemuel Calvin Sprague for a father. When the book opens she is the wife of a man whom she has married simply and exclusively for his money and whom she has come to loathe from the very bottom of her soul. After a time her husband not only loses his fortune, but is convicted of the embezzlement of trust funds. He is sent to prison, and Paulina then goes to visit an old friend of her mother's in the little Southern town where her mother was born and lived until her marriage, and where she is still remembered. There enlightenment comes to Paulina, partly through the sweetness and goodness of every one she meets, partly through her own love for a

EXTRICATING OBADIAH

The New Cape Cod Romance

By JOSEPH C. LINCOLN

Obadiah Burgess always had a knack of getting into trouble. But he was quite unprepared for the things that happen when he inherits a fortune and finds that every grafter on Cape Cod is bent upon fleecing him. He needs help, so he sends for Cap'n Noah Newcomb. How Cap'n Noah extricates "Obe" and in his spare time helps to unravel a tangled romance is a merry tale that will keep you chuckling. It is a perfect gift book, and a safe one to give, for the story has not been published serially by any magazine.

"There's a Reason" for Praise Like This:

In Captain Noah Newcomb Mr. Lincoln has created a genuine "character" as lovable as sunshine and as true to life as life itself. It is a work which from first to last will be a joy to the reader, with a promise of no less joy at the second reading which deserves to follow, and one which must be placed in the first rank of the fiction of the year.—The New York Tribune.

It is the sort of a thing one can read and enjoy. One will not need to run for maps to study the newest "advance" or learn the location of the "fire trench". War is as far away as Broadway from the Trumet Mr. Lincoln pictures.—The New York Evening Mail.

All good wholesome stuff, with a laugh in it that tickles like the tip of an angel's wing caressing your Adam's apple. "Extricating Obadiah" is a greater work than Homer's "Iliad", "The Philosophy of Henry James", "Sartor Resartus", "The Arabian Nights", or "The Encyclopedia Britannica".—Chicago Daily News.

The large audience whom Joseph C. Lincoln habitually pleases will find that his new Cape Cod tale, "Extricating Obadiah," possesses all the merits and characteristics which made the best of his preceding stories uniquely entertaining and amusing.—The Springfield Republican.

A delightful humor pervades the new story by Joseph C. Lincoln. The situation itself is amusing enough, but the humor is enhanced by Mr. Lincoln's treatment of it and by the quaint characters around which the story revolves.—New Orleans Times-Picayune.

One of those droll tales that have relieved so many persons who have been bored by emotional fiction when they wanted the common sense or garden variety.—Grand Rapids News.

Joseph C. Lincoln still is finding entrancing characters round about Cape Cod and in his new book, "Extricating Obadiah" he displays a fresh lot for the entertainment of his always ready readers.—The New York World.

NOTABLE BOOKS IN BRIEF REVIEW

FOR FRANCE. Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.50.

THE idea of giving the writers and artists of America a chance to express themselves for France came to Mrs. William Astor Chanler. In the book "For France" we see the concrete realisation of that idea.

It is amazing simply as a collection of names, if nothing more. Writers of stories or books or poems, painters of pictures, illustrators, cartoonists, sculptors, architects, musicians, all that makes for the creative side of American life in any of the arts through the men and women of America, has contributed a passionate expression of the love and the admiration that France has roused in the soul of America. It is with a beauty and sincerity that witness to the joy of the many contributors that this expression is given, and the volume strikes a lofty note as a work of art—art with a purpose, certainly. But that purpose is nothing less than to do honor to the heights of human courage and devotion, steadfast through unimaginable suffering and loss. Such a purpose has proved to be a powerful inspiration.

The volume is introduced by Theodore Roosevelt, who expresses his sympathy and admiration for France and his enthusiasm for the cause for which we, too, are now fighting, in brief, forceful phrases. Following this introduction are three contributions from contributors who served France eagerly, but who will not see the hoped-for glorious end of this long war. Richard Harding Davis did not actually die in France. But he worked for her, and in the letter included here he gives voice to his convictions, convictions that became intensified after the Lusitania outrage. The letter was written to the Chanlers' little son, and is reproduced in facsimile, as is the sonnet by Alan Seeger, who fell on the field of battle. The third contribution is a drawing by Victor Chapman, killed in his airplane while flying over the German lines.

Owen Wister has written his tribute in French, and it is at once a tribute of gratitude for what France has done and a prayer that she should lead the nations to the re-establishment of a finer and a safer civilization once the catastrophe is over.

Booth Tarkington, George Barr McCutcheon, Gertrude Atherton, each give us a poignant sketch of a definite incident, a sure portrait of two or three French men and women, simple folk bearing themselves heroically when the call comes, meeting tragedy and danger with serene courage, almost with happiness, that happiness which is born of complete self-forgetfulness. Augustus Thomas tells, in half a dozen noble pages, his debt to France. It is a debt we all owe, and dates from long before the victory of the Marne. He paints for us many impressions derived in visits to France, and sums these up in the following words:

> It seems to me as I revive and study these impressions on my mind and upon my soul that here was a democracy of men competing to do and to contribute, rather than a conglomeration struggling to get and to keep.

From Joseph H. Choate, dated February, 1917, comes a strong plea for our entry into the war. So, too, from Porter Emerson Browne, picturing with passionate contempt the contrast between war-torn Europe and overfed, indulgent America, fattening on the wealth wrung from the desperate battle for civilization waging over there—a contrast that is, Heaven be thanked, no longer a fact. And one cannot help feeling that one great reason why we are at last doing the duty that sternly beckoned us is because such men as these did without ceasing insist that we should do it.

Oliver Herford has contributed a sonnet and two drawings—drawings that put the suffering of Louvain before the eyes with a few strokes of vivid imagination and words that sound the destroyer's shame with a poet's scorn of scorn. Many poets have written flaming lines in this book. Henry Sydnor Harrison, Edith M. Thomas, Theodosia Garrison, Josephine Preston Peabody, Percy MacKaye, Vachel Lindsay, Edgar Lee Masters, Irving Batcheller, Charles Rann Kennedy, these are some of them. And there are many drawings, some in color, one of these by Sargent; some in pen and ink or crayon or pastel, by such men as John Sloan, Robert Henri, John Wolcott Adams, Cesare, Albert Sterner, William Glackens, Wallace Morgan, Ernest Lawson, James Preston, Boardman Robinson, Sergeant Kendall, Walter Hale, to name a few.

William Dean Howells has sent a paragraph, General Goethals an illuminating page, Sousa some burning words; John Burroughs, Garrett P. Serviss, Frank H. Simonds, Otis Skinner, the Sotherns, Maud Powell, Henry Cabot Lodge, all contributed to give a haphazard list. There is original music by Scheelling, Arthur Foote, John Alden Carpenter, and others. The cover design is by Wyeth, C. P. Falls has made the decoration for the title page. The editing is the work of Charles Hanson Towne, who, in a brief foreword, tells of the pleasure he found in the labor, a labor that must have been tremendous. In this notice it has been impossible to name all of the best known contributors. The book is a treasure of picture, poem, article, story, exquisitely presented. The entire proceeds from the sale of the volume go to the French Heroes Fund, so that every purchaser will not only acquire a peculiarly rich and beautiful tribute to France, but will be contributing his own bit for that heroic land and people. The original manuscripts are to be preserved in the Château Lafayette, in France, for whose purchase Mrs. Chanler negotiated.

BARNARD'S LINCOLN

BARNARD'S LINCOLN: The Creation and Dedication of George Grey Barnard's Statue of Abraham Lincoln, Including the Address of William Howard Taft. Illustrated. Cincinnati: Stewart & Kidd Company. 50 cents.

THIS handsome booklet is a memorial of the Barnard statue of Lincoln, concerning which a heated controversy is now in progress and of the ceremony of its unveiling on March 31 last. It contains the ode to the statue read on that occasion by Dr. Lyman Whitney Allen, an article by George Grey Barnard, the sculptor, in which he gives an account of how and why he created just the kind of figure he did and why he thinks it expresses the spirit of Lincoln; ex-President Taft's presentation address, and the short speech of acceptance by Mayor Puchta of Cincinnati.

Mr. Barnard was at work upon the statue for six years. He tells how carefully he sought for a model:

> My intense desire to tell the truth about Lincoln's form led me to search through two years for a model that should approximate the man he must have been. I traveled through the States, North and South, East and West. I advertised and went personally to look at many men. At last in Louisville, Ky., after a great number had come to me, I found the one I wanted. He was 6 feet 4½ inches, and realized as nearly as any other being conceivably could all that we knew of Lincoln's appearance. * * * A study of this man's body showed it to be in harmony with the body of Lincoln. It was a genuine product of American soil, as typical in its way as the Indians. The legs were long and he had a back that seemed to bend without producing a corresponding cavity in front. I spoke of this to him and he said: "I have been splitting rails all my life." He was about 40 years old. That was the natural explanation of his overdeveloped back and shoulders.

Mr. Barnard says that he "found the many photographs of Lincoln retouched so that all form had been obliterated," which had been done, he thinks, in an effort "to prettify this work of God by the photographers of the time." He worked much from the mask made by Douglas Volk, and says that out of his study of the mask "grew the entire poise of his figure."

Judge Taft in his address analyzed briefly Lincoln's career and character, summing up their message to the world in these words:

> Lincoln, to us and to the world, means wisdom and equal opportunity. He means the triumph of the moral over the expedient. He does not mean material growth. He does not mean physical comfort. He means justice to the humble and the downtrodden. He does not suggest great commercial strides. The United States is the richest nation in the world today. Its growth, the development of its resources, its rapid and substantial expansion are the wonder of economists. Yet Lincoln stands for nothing of this. No one thinks of national wealth when Lincoln is named. Why then is he the great American? Because he is to us the supreme sacrifice to virtue. * * * He signifies the finding of ourselves. In our greatest national crisis he means our moral national triumph after trials and blunders and defeat.

The illustrations are made from a photograph of the head and shoulders of Mr. Barnard's statue from a full-length photograph from an etching by E. T. Hurley showing another full-length view of the statue, and from views of its appearance in its present environment of the scene at its presentation and of Mr. Bernard in his studio.

THE DINNER PAIL

THE DINNER PAIL. By Addison C. Thomas. Illustrated. Hammond, Indiana: W. B. Conkey Company.

IN a neat booklet, its paper cover gay with the flags of this country and our chief allies and a cartoon of Uncle Sam brandishing a sword in one hand and a scythe in the other, Addison C. Thomas, who is a newspaper man of Chicago, makes an ardent and forceful plea for the agricultural preparedness of the United States. His conviction, which, of course, is shared with him by all observing and thinking people, is that this nation must produce foodstuffs in far greater amount than it has ever done before, and, since it must do this while hampered by the stern necessity of using a great proportion of its man and money power in warfare and in the production of the tools of warfare, it is incumbent upon all the government and the people alike to use for crop growing every possible acre of land and to make every acre produce to its highest efficiency. Mr. Thomas takes up the matter from the viewpoints of many varying possibilities and brings forward incidents, figures, statements, arguments, to drive home a realisation of the crisis with energy, vivacity, and ardent feeling.

He says that we must have fifty million more acres than are now in tillage in this country to meet the food necessities of our nation and of the Allies, whom we must help, and an army of a million workers to till it. Government action will be necessary, he feels sure, to get this amount of additional land into cultivation immediately and to organize such a food producing army. He would have the Government seize every idle farm and every untilled arable acre wherever found and make all such land productive. He is particularly interested in the bill, providing for increased agricultural activity that was introduced in the House at the last session by Congressman Medill McCormick of Illinois, which at adjournment was left in the hands of the Committee on Agriculture, and urges its support upon all who are alive to the gravity of the situation. Many interesting and important instances are recounted of what is already being done to increase production by railroads, States, business organizations. At some length, for instance, he describes the drive that was made in Kansas this year by which nearly three million more acres were brought under cultivation than had been previously tilled. A Land and Industrial Bureau organized by The Chicago Herald and installed in a large building in that city, where it houses a sort of permanent agricultural fair and in many ways endeavors to increase interest in the agricultural needs of the time, is cited and described as an example of one interesting method of helping the drive for increased production.

Observation: Every Man His Own University
By Russell H. Conwell

Have you ever said: "I could do this or that if I had had the advantage of a college education"? The author of "Acres of Diamonds" shows that even if you have not been to college you can be the master of your own education and your own success. How to achieve—these words might be the sub-title. How to achieve an education, a place in the world, happiness. Dr. Conwell shows how these things can be acquired, how the right kind of learning is at the very door of every one—and how, by seizing it, we can make ourselves and the world better.

The booklet deserves wide reading and ought to be an efficient aid in arousing the American people to a realization of the grave crisis which they face.

VALENTINE'S MANUAL

VALENTINE'S MANUAL OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK, 1917-1918. New Series No. 2. Edited by Henry Collins Brown. New York: The Old Colony Press.

A VERITABLE mine of interesting and valuable material and illustrations has been collected by Henry Collins Brown of the New York Historical Society for this second number of the new issue of "Valentine's Manual." For the idea of the enterprise he deserves the gratitude of all lovers of the city and of all who are interested in the steps by which it has grown to greatness. The romance of history is in the very name of the book and in its origin. For it was originally established in 1816 as the City Hall Directory. In 1840 the title was changed to the "Manual of the Corporation of the City of New York" and placed under the editorial management of David T. Valentine, Clerk of the Common Council. Under him it made so great a success as a repository of glimpses of the past in word and picture and of the stories of the passing years that it became, on everybody's tongue, "Valentine's" Manual. And so to his ability and success Mr. Brown pays tribute in the title of this revival of the yearly publication. He mentions modestly the unexpected success of the first issue of this new incarnation of the Manual last year. This second issue is even more interesting in its contents than was the first and deserves to be read and supported by all loyal New Yorkers.

The revival of the Manual has led to a remarkable increase of interest in the numbers of the old issue, and it is said that the earliest volume under Mr. Valentine's editorship, which was then distributed gratuitously in large editions by the city, is now considered cheap at $150 per copy.

The new volume contains seventy or more articles of varying length, some of them giving descriptions of scenes and events fifty, a hundred, two hundred years ago, and others concerned with the affairs of last year or of recent decades. To mention only a few of them, Walter Prichard Eaton writes a charming account of the old Lafayette Place, where the Seventh Regiment formed as it marched away under waving banners to the music of bands and cheers during the civil war; Hopper Striker Mott contributes an article on "Jones's Wood"; Sturges S. Dunham writes of "Old Bond Street"; Reginald Pelham Bolton tells what the "Historical Explorations in the City of New York" are doing and describes the interesting results of the work; there is a very charming account of "A Girl's Life in New York Ninety Years Ago," described by Catalina Adams, an old lady who spent her childhood in lower Broadway; Judge Victor J. Dowling writes of "The Irish Pioneers in New York"; there are descriptions of many of the important institutions of the city at the present time, among them being one of the Metropolitan Museum of Art by Winifred E. Howe. The illustrations are as interesting as the text. Among them are eleven colored plates, of which many are reproduced from quaint old aquatints and oil paintings and others show the blaze of color that filled Fifth Avenue and Broadway last Summer when the city welcomed the visiting war commissions. There are reproductions of about eighty rare old photographs that preserved the appearance of as many localities at varying times during the last hundred years. Some of these are here published for the first time. And there is a folding supplement in photogravure showing contrasting views of the waterfront and the lower city from Brooklyn Bridge to the Battery at the present time and in 1876.

Mr. Brown announces the preparation for the next issue of the Manual of some very interesting features. One will be on the ships and the ocean and river trade of old New York, one on the villages, and another on the farms of the old-time city, while still another will be the reproduction of all the pictures in the old Valentine Manuals.

VALUE OF THE CLASSICS

VALUE OF THE CLASSICS. Edited by Andrew F. West, Dean of the Graduate College, Princeton University. Princeton University Press. $1.50.

WITH this book we are in the presence of a phase of the conflict between objective and subjective truth. The lion and the unicorn are fighting for the crown, and their devices are "What is it good for?" and "Where there is no vision the people perish." Classical studies, says the vocationalists, are unnecessary and even a hindrance in this age of specialization and efficiency in the development of material interests. The ablest leaders of the attack say that it is merely upon the predominance of Latin and Greek in a theory of liberal education, and it seems true that the position of these studies and not their existence is what is threatened; but the movement is in its essence one toward an educational system that is based on expediency and is doubtful of any advantage that cannot be measured in terms of utility. The question of division between vocational and cultural education involves the question of faith in the unity of truth. It would seem as though there were, in the words of the most introspective of novelists, something inherent in the necessities of successful action which carried with it the moral degradation of the idea.

This book is the record of the addresses delivered at the Princeton Conference on Classical Studies in Liberal Education, together with statements by nearly three hundred leaders in modern thought and achievement, and statistics proving that the classical student is more successful than the non-classical in meeting intellectual tests. Most of the statements agree on the question of mental discipline; nearly all of them emphasize the value of classical studies in laying a foundation for the use of correct and effective English, and as furnishing a basis for the study of all modern languages. "It has been, on the whole, my experience," says President Hadley of Yale, "that men trained in the classics did better work in law, in economics, and in most lines of writing which require careful analysis than men who had been trained in other lines." But the book is impressive in its plea for a true conception of education as the preparation for a large and full life, a life of spiritual growth and broadening mental vision, which will contain a care for the meaning of Greek and Roman thought. Professor Scott of Princeton suggests the higher argument as forcibly as any one when he says that education has to be a compromise between the training for making a living and the training for making that living worth while after it has been made.

The majority of the addresses and statements lay slight emphasis on the important question of method. Dr. William S. Thayer points out that Latin and Greek are far from being dead languages to the Continental student, but that they are dead to us because they are taught to us as dead. Dean West, in the introduction, outlines the situation and concludes that we need to start in the classics earlier and teach them better, and that we need something more—freshening of the spirit through a Revival of Learning.

A CRITICAL ANTHOLOGY

THE POETIC YEAR FOR 1916. A Critical Anthology. By William Stanley Braithwaite. Small, Maynard & Co.

MR. BRAITHWAITE or his publishers, or both, are in the habit of displaying exceptionally good taste in the format of his books, and "The Poetic Year for 1916" is no exception to the rule. It is a volume of mature bulk, gowned, as it were, to youthful slenderness in gray-blue boards and an enticing severity of paper label.

But its graceful restraint is purely physical. In spirit it sits redundant, unconfined, and bland, like a comfortable matron whose daughters vainly implore her to have some regard for her figure. Its contents have appeared in the columns of The Boston Transcript during the last year, and consist of comment upon current books of verse, tossed conversationally between the author and three lay figures known as Jason, Psyche, and Cassandra, and liberally interspersed with descriptions of New Hampshire countryside. The method has attractive possibilities not wholly unfulfilled, half hidden, as they are, in the mass of Mr. Braithwaite's fat satisfactions. If he had called it an Appreciative, not a Critical, Anthology no one could have quarreled with him. But the idea of separation, of a division between black and white, at least, is implicit in the word "criticism," and of such separation there is little trace in Mr. Braithwaite's purling periods.

Some sixty-odd poets are mentioned at greater or less length in "The Poetic Year," most of them Americans, though English poets are by no means excluded. Of all these, only "a certain group of obscure

THE RISE OF DAVID LEVINSKY

ABRAHAM CAHAN'S
New Novel
is praised by the critics everywhere

N. Y. Times:
"The dominant quality in this novel is the effect it gives of being altogether real. . . . Levinsky's very soul is stripped bare before us; we know him intimately, know him as we know few of our friends or relatives."

N. Y. Tribune:
"A masterpiece of imaginative realism. . . . In its intimacy, its frankness, its multiplicity of detail, its unreserved baring of acts, motives and feelings, it is scarcely to be surpassed and not often rivaled in the whole range of literature."

N. Y. Eve. Post:
"Actual as the central figure appears, he embodies not merely the intellectual and spiritual history of David Levinsky, but that of his people. This is partly due to the vigor with which all the characters are drawn, from the poor, orthodox population of David's native town to the tenement dwellers in New York's lower East Side and the prosperous bourgeois in the Jewish summer resorts."

Boston Transcript:
"So great is the illusion of the autobiography that one's feeling of reading fiction is completely lost. . . . 'The Rise of David Levinsky' is more than a book of talent; in fact, it is a book of genius."

Philadelphia Public Ledger:
"This intensely interesting narrative might almost be called autobiographic, so closely does it hew to the realities of life."

Chicago Tribune:
"As a piece of stark realism, Mr. Cahan's novel is to be admired. . . . Mr. Cahan has, with a clear artistic conscience, given us an impressive picture of a man in contemporary life."

Portland Oregonian:
"'The Rise of David Levinsky' will be acclaimed as a famous novel by a famous author."

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF AUDUBON

AUDUBON THE NATURALIST: A History of His Life and Time. By Francis Hobart Herrick, Ph. D., Sc. D. In two volumes. Illustrated. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $7.50.

BY one of those curious accidents not unknown to scholarship, Professor Herrick, the present biographer of the great American naturalist, succeeded in finding a mass of documents, in the possession of an old notary of Coueron, France, which clears up finally the mystery of John Audubon's parentage and birth. He was born not in Louisiana, as the encyclopedias say, but in Les Cayes, Santo Domingo, now Haiti. The elder Audubon, the story of whose life as admirably sketched by the biographer is as fascinating as one of the later picaresque romances of Daniel Defoe, was born in 1744. At 14 he fought in the Seven Years' War, was captured and taken to England and kept there for four years, engaged in the codfish trade and made four voyages to Newfoundland on his release, later enlisted in the French Navy, had numberless fights with English privateers and, later still, as things fell out, even had a command at the battle of Yorktown. It was after the American Revolution that he went to Santo Domingo, leaving his wife at Nantes, and there "as merchant, planter, and dealer in slaves" he amassed a large fortune. It was there the future naturalist was born; his mother was a Creole woman of whom little is known. Indeed, the only record of birth is in a remarkable bill for medical services luckily among the papers in Professor Herrick's find.

The elder Audubon took his infant son back to France with him before the terrible revolt of the blacks in Haiti had reached its fiercest. It is a cause for surprise that Mme. Audubon took the young child to her heart with as much solicitude as though he were her own; and all his life Audubon looked back to his stepmother with a reverence and affection which could not have been surpassed if she were his real mother. The revolution in Haiti caused the elder Audubon to lose his fortune, but he did not learn of this till after the greater revolution in his own country, in which he took an active part, was well over. Among the most interesting and valuable chapters in this ample biography are these early ones describing the terrible condition among the slaves and planters in the Haiti of Toussaint L'Ouverture—whose eulogy by Wendell Phillips is spouted by every schoolboy. The reign of terror at Nantes, the story of "Citizen" Audubon's Lieutenancy in the Republican army, furnish an interesting sidelight on the history of those terrible days in France. We are accustomed to think of the revolution as reaching its darkest terrors in Paris; nothing could be worse, however, than the conditions in this quiet town on the Loire. The reign of terror under Carrier, who openly advocated "suppressing" half the population of France, was no less terrible than the reign of terror under Robespierre. Told against a flaring background of revolution the story of the elder Audubon has a deep historical and human interest quite apart from the more special one. Indeed the whole book partakes of this wider interest. John Audubon tramped about America long before the advent of Mr. Pullman, when Pittsburgh was little more than a village and the Ohio River a sparsely settled stream. In more ways than one, Audubon's story, as told by Professor Herrick, epitomizes the great American epic of the first half of the nineteenth century.

The story of Audubon's life is the story of an overmastering passion for nature:

> Living things of every description which he found by the banks of the Loire or along the stone walls and hedgerows of Coueron gave him the greatest pleasure, but birds were his early favorites. These he soon began to depict with pencil and crayon, but to the drier discipline of the school he ever turned with laggard feet.

This passage gives the clue to Audubon's failure in business and his final devotion to what became his lifework. Everything was "dry discipline" with Audubon that was not connected with nature, particularly with birds. His heart, all the time he was engaged in business—and he was so engaged for the first thirty-five years of his life—was in the great outdoors. No matter what else he was doing he was hunting and sketching birds.

On one of his early journeys to this country Audubon's father had purchased an estate, "Mill Grove," near Philadelphia, and here John Audubon came in 1803 to learn English and enter trade. It was here he met the woman without whose constant encouragement and help the difficulties he later encountered might have proved insurmountable. He went into business in New York and later, with another friend, made a hejira to Louisville, Ky., where he opened a store in partnership with a friend who afterward became successful in business. It was here that Audubon met Alexander Wilson, the ornithologist, traveling to obtain subscriptions for his "American Ornithology." The description of Wilson's journey to New Orleans from New York furnishes a delightful picture of American life in such cities as Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, and Louisville in the first decade of the nineteenth century.

The Louisville experiment was not a success and Audubon and his partner set out for St. Genevieve, La., a 165-mile journey, which lasted over nine weeks. Other business ventures followed till finally, after a disastrous experiment with a mill in Henderson, Ky., Audubon was jailed for debt. Then came what Professor Herrick calls "Audubon's Aeneid"—his wanderings through West and South in the years 1819-1824.

Audubon's failure at Henderson was the crucial turning point in his life. For the five years that immediately followed he led a peripatetic existence in the southern and western States, seldom tarrying long at one point, often leaving his family for months at a time, living from hand to mouth, but ever bent on perfecting those products of his hand and brain, his life studies of American birds and plants.

It was at this time that Audubon decided to make his avocation his life work, and in 1824, in Philadelphia, then "the Mecca of the scientific man," Audubon made his début as a naturalist. But it was not till he went to Europe, when he was 41 years of age, that he received recognition commensurate with his deserts. In England his drawings created a furore; people declared that nothing like them had ever been seen. At Edinburgh he was much lionized as Robert Burns had been earlier; he met everybody, including Sir Walter Scott. In one of his letters to his wife he describes this meeting with the editor, Jeffrey. "Jeffrey," he says, "is a little man who entered the room with a lady under one arm and hat under the other."

From Edinburgh Audubon went to London, where he made arrangements for the publication of "The Birds of America." It was not till 1838, twelve years later, that the work was finally published. Of this great book and its publication Professor Herrick speaks as follows:

> Audubon's day of greatest triumph came on June 20, 1838, when he had the supreme satisfaction of seeing the last plate of his "Book of Nature," "The Birds of America," completed. Having been begun virtually in the Autumn of 1826, it was le press nearly twelve years. The sumptuous character of this work, its commanding beauty, as well as its surprising accuracy, considering all the obstacles of time and circumstance, mark it, when combined with its letterpress, as one of the most remarkable and interesting undertakings in the history of literature and science in the nineteenth century. Unique as it was in every detail of its workmanship, it will remain for centuries a shining example of the triumph of human endeavor and of the spirit and will of man.

As far as possible Professor Herrick allows Audubon to tell his own story. There are numerous quotations from letters, and a generous appendix containing copies of original, hitherto undiscovered documents, these documents which clear up for the first time the mystery of Audubon's birth and parentage. The volumes are beautifully printed and magnificently illustrated, many of the plates being reproductions in color of Audubon's drawings. For the reader whose interest in Audubon is scientific the book is invaluable; the more general reader will find it a fascinating story of tremendous struggle and great achievement.

GERMAN PRISONS

SIXTEEN MONTHS IN FOUR GERMAN PRISONS. By Henry C. Mahoney, with the collaboration of Frederick A. Talbot. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co. $1.50.

THE four prisons in which Mr. Mahoney was confined were at Wesel, Sennelager, Klingelputz, and Ruhleben. An English subject, he was sent in July, 1914, to the palace of a certain Prince in Russia, to devote two months to scientific work which, unfortunately for him, involved the use of special and elaborate photographic apparatus, microscopes, optical lantern, and other accessories. How he was held at the frontier by German officials, and how he soon found himself in prison charged with being a spy, is set forth in one of the most graphic and picturesque series of adventures that have appeared in print for a long time. The wonder is not that the author suffered so much in the various prisons—for the world has come to accept as true any and every story of German atrocities by this time—but that eventually he contrived to break through the Teutonic cordon and reach his home and family. Dreadful as is the recital, with incidents of torture and suffering that remind one of some of the narrations of the elder Dumas, there is a vein of humor running through the whole book that redoubles the reader's sympathy for the intrepid Briton. His courage never deserted him. On the other hand, he could not get over his indignation at being treated as a spy when he knew he was innocent, and obviously his defiance of his captors was often responsible for the increase in the tortures and indignities they visited upon him. It is impossible to follow seriatim the experiences of the author. That can be done by reading his book, and gruesome as it is in general, there is so much lightness and pleasantry, the result of the innate bravery of the man, that it is not so depressing as might be expected. Altogether, it is a curious example of the way in which the most awful of human hardships and sufferings can be made to appear only as rather extreme adventure. This is but a superficial view, however. Underneath, one discerns the tragedy, and its effect is to increase the abhorrence of those who are responsible for the world's war and to make one long to come to grips to revenge such evils as are here told. The book is more than a recital of a prisoner's sufferings in Germany; it is a splendidly thrilling tale of heroism and adventure. That there shall be no question as to the truth of his published statements, Mr. Mahoney made a sworn declaration to its accuracy in London on Oct. 19, 1916, and a facsimile of the affidavit is given on a page at the beginning of the volume.

RUSSIA IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

CONTEMPORARY RUSSIAN COMPOSERS. By M. Montagu-Nathan. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $2.50.

SCRIABIN: A Great Russian Tone Poet. By A. Eaglefield Hull. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co. $1.25.

THE Russians continue to get their share of attention, in the musical field, as well as in others. These two recent additions to the biographical and critical accounts of the modern composers of Russia are welcome, especially because they contribute a body of new facts about the life and works of some of the younger men as well as of discussion of their music and their artistic ideals.

Mr. Montagu-Nathan is the author of a recent history of Russian music, and speaks evidently from a first-hand knowledge of his subject and its sources. His book is devoted to the most recent of the Russian composers, most of them young men, and correspondingly radical. Taneyeff, Glazunoff, and Grechaninoff are the oldest of them. The rest are of "the younger generation"—several so young that their names have not got into the reference books nor their music upon Western concert programs. On this account, especially, the book is valuable.

Mr. Nathan begins with a brief sketch of the modern movement in Russian music, a more than twice-told tale, in which he shows the hostility between the "Nationalists"—the "Five"—and their rivals; and does the service of carrying on the story and showing also that the primitive Nationalists' method is a thing of the past. For Russian composers have ceased to base their music on folk-tunes, and symphonies and operas are no longer devoted exclusively to the celebrations of great figures and episodes of Russian history. He thinks this movement by no means moribund, however, and finds a subtler expression of it in such works as Stravinsky's.

The author begins with a detailed sketch of "Skryabin"—so spelled—glowing perhaps with a warmer enthusiasm than has as yet been generally aroused in this neighborhood by such of his works as have been heard. Scriabin's style changed radically from one obviously Chopinesque and reeking of the salon to one seeking—a little too consciously, some will think—the most modern and radical effects of form and harmony. Mr. Nathan believes that his later works make him a figure "altogether Titanic." Glazunoff's is a more conventional one; he has even renounced more and more the assistance of a "program" for his music. Stravinsky, who has already had a change of heart toward one or two of his earlier works, has acquired merit thereby in Mr. Nathan's eyes, and he numbers him now among "the greatest of contemporary masters." He says of him:

> No other Russian composer so faithfully carries on the tradition established by the Father of Russian music, and no other realizes so fully the meaning of the dictum of Mussorgsky that music must continue to reflect our human evolution or die.

Rachmaninof, Réblkof—" who has proceeded through Strauss to a curious mixture of the French Conservatoire idiom and Skryabinism"—Taneyeff, valued and influential as a teacher; Medtner, Tcherpnin, and Grechaninoff are the others of the elder generation treated here. Of the younger the names of Glière, Vassilenko, Akimenko, and Catoire are more or less widely known, and only a few of the rest. The numerous portraits are an interesting feature of the book.

Dr. Eaglefield Hull devotes his book chiefly to an analysis of Scriabin's works, both for the pianoforte and for orchestra. The pianoforte works comprise preludes, études, nocturnes, &c., a concerto and ten sonatas; the orchestral three symphonies, the "Poem of Ecstasy" and "Prometheus." There is a brief biography, preceded by the inevitable exposition of the musical awakening in Russia. It is hardly necessary to say that Dr. Eaglefield Hull is an ardent advocate. Scriabin has accomplished a good deal for one man, according to his estimate:

> He gives us a completely new system of harmony; he abolishes the major and minor modes; he annihilates modulation and chromatic inflection; he abandons all key signatures, and finally applies his ideas to the most modern scale we have reached so far, i. e., the "duodecuple." Moreover, at the time of his death, he was experimenting with the unification of the various arts of sound, light and bodily movement, (mimique) and as if all this were not enough, wove a system of theosophy into the art of his latest period.

And, a little later, "Scriabin has brought about a complete renewal of the hearing faculty."

But Dr. Hull can't quite "go" the "theosophy" of Scriabin's music. He regards it as a convenient "peg" for the composer to hang his music on, and is inclined to think that the music has as little to do with the theosophy as the garment with the peg it hangs on. Nor is he very enthusiastic in his support of Scriabin's theories about color and music, and his attempt to realize them in the "Prometheus."

His analyses of the music are tinged with the admiration here suggested. They are extensive and detailed. Musical notation is freely used. The mystery of Scriabin's new scales and new chords is expounded; perhaps it would be too much to say that it is made plain. But if there is any key to the music of Scriabin's later period, it ought to be found here. At any rate, Dr. Hull's comments are intelligent, granting the point of view; and his book should be valuable to the followers of the new and to any who wish to know the new.

In appendices are lists of his works, each with a brief descriptive paragraph. There is a list of Russian and other names, with what purports to be their pronunciation; but many of the pronunciations are singularly unfortunate; some are wrong and some are equivocal.

AN AUTHORS FUND

New York Times Review of Books:

AMONG all the many organizations which are to join in making "Hero Land," the big Allied Bazaar at the Grand Central Palace, a success, there is surely not one more interesting to readers of THE BOOK REVIEW than that of the Authors Fund. Under the direction of a committee including such names as those of Gertrude Atherton, Irvin Cobb, Ellis Parker Butler, Hamlin Garland, Jesse Lynch Williams, and Charles Dana Gibson, this fund is to have a booth at "Hero Land" where it hopes and expects to raise a goodly sum for its work among those engaged in literary, artistic and musical composition, so many of whom have suffered through the war and are terribly in need of assistance.

The booth is to have attractions and surprises of many kinds, and it will be served by men and women whose names are well known to the reading public. There you may buy your favorite novel from your favorite author, and some interesting souvenir from and of your best beloved writer of short stories. Contributions of autographed books and letters, paintings, rugs, jewelry, antiques—small articles of every sort and description are wanted. Send what you can to the Author's Fund, 33 West Forty-second Street, and when you come to "Hero Land" do not fail to pay a visit to the Authors Fund Booth—you will find it more than worth your while.

THE YEAR'S BEST BOOKS

THE Joint Committee of the Literary Arts has inaugurated, for its annual exhibition at the National Arts Club this month, a feature that should be of decided interest to those who study the significant developments in our current literature. Heretofore this exhibition has been little more than a sort of publisher's bazaar in which some of the publications of the year, selected chiefly for their bindings, were placed on view. The exhibition lacked system and unity, and failed to convey a comprehensive idea of the year's contribution to literature. This season, however, the Chairman of the committee, Mr. HAMLIN GARLAND, put in operation a plan from which it seems possible really to gain an intelligent estimate of the books of 1917. Thus, from the book lists furnished by the publishers, the lists of "leading books" published in the Spring and Fall in THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW, together with other lists, a final series of titles was compiled by the committee. These titles were then sent to "a jury of fifty representative critics, including literary editors of the principal daily papers, a dozen college professors of literature, an equal number of men of science in the leading universities, together with other specialists peculiarly fitted to pass upon scientific and historical volumes." Each member of this jury then checked off on this list the books that appeared to him, or her, important, and from the list, thus marked, the committee compiled this "representative 1917 collection" of 300 books, all of which are now on exhibition in the National Arts Club. In the forthcoming December number of Current Opinion Mr. E. J. WHEELER, who was especially active on the committee in carrying out the plan, makes this interesting analysis of the work of the "jury":

It is of interest to note that "The Life and Letters of Edward Everett Hale," for which all but seven of the fifty jurors voted, received the largest number of ballots cast for any one of the 300 books. It also is noteworthy that the voting on fiction was remarkably light, not more than half of the jurors voting for more than five in a list of 119 fiction candidates. First choice fell to ERNEST POOLE'S "His Family," which received 32 votes, as compared with 29 each for KIPLING'S "A Diversity of Creatures," EDEN PHILLPOTT'S "The Banks of Colne," and ALICE CHOLMONDELEY'S "Christine"—all of British authorship. Works of biography not only received first honor, but second and third as well, 39 ballots being cast for MARK TWAIN'S "Letters" and 38 for VISCOUNT MORLEY'S "Recollections." Other leaders in the balloting were BRANDER MATTHEWS'S "These Many Years," and GARLAND'S "Son of the Middle Border," each getting 36 votes; FABRE'S "Life of the Grasshopper," 37; GOSSE'S "Swinburne," 38, and GORKY'S "In the World," 35, while "Rodin: The Man and His Art," was voted for 31 times, as was GERARD'S "My Four Years in Germany." The collected poems of WILFRID WILSON GIBSON, with 27 votes, was first choice in the poetry and drama classification.

ATTEMPTS of this kind to bring together in one survey the leading books of the year are always interesting and instructive. Such lists, of course, must inevitably reflect something of the bias, or the limitations, of those who make them, and, in so far as they do this, they fall short of perfection. Infallibility in literary opinion, indeed, is quite as unattainable as in anything else. But a conscientious selection of "books of the year" is bound to be of service, and the Joint Committee's plan of putting the books thus selected on exhibition is certainly a happy one. For many seasons past THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW has presented to its readers an annual list of this kind as a sort of climax, or summing up, of the year's achievement in the various branches of literature. The list thus compiled is based on the critical study of the year's books as these have appeared from week to week since January, supplemented by the actual experience of publishers from which they are able to judge of the relative value of their publications. This year the list will comprise 200 titles and will be published in a special Holiday Number of THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW on Dec. 2. Under each title in the list will be given a brief description of the book, the whole to be classified and arranged alphabetically according to authors. To help the reader still further in acquiring an adequate estimate of the year's literary activities there will be a series of authoritative articles reviewing the noteworthy features of 1917 in the leading branches of literature—fiction, poetry, history, biography, travel, &c. The Holiday Number will contain, also, a continuation of the BOOK REVIEW'S War Bibliography covering the period since the first of October.

IN thus bringing together the books of the year in their various branches it is worth noting that the number of works of fiction is by no means so large, proportionally, as it used to be. There is a slight decrease, also, in books on the war—a decrease shown in the last half of the year as compared with the first half. In either case it would be unsafe to conclude that the decrease is due to a falling off of popular interest either in war books or books of fiction. It may be that there are fewer good books written in both departments; hence the shrinkage in the number published. Some recently published war books, we know, have reached a very large sale indeed, proving that this type of literature is decidedly popular. On the other hand there have been indications from numerous sources of a demand for fiction that is in no way related to the war—for the kind of novel whose interest is so absorbing that one may find in its pages, if only for a brief moment, a rest from the thought of war. The recent publication, for instance, of a new volume of "Sherlock Holmes" stories was hailed, by many looking for this kind of relief, with delight. It was felt that if anyone could free the mind from the obsession of one idea it was the famous London detective. But, unfortunately, even in the best of fiction seasons, there are not many books that can wield the absorbing fascination exerted by DOYLE'S immortal combination of Holmes and Dr. Watson. And in a time like this, more than ever before, it is only the novel of exceptional interest that can expect a large measure of success.

THIS fluctuation in the number of books of fiction, due, probably, to the fact that there are fewer novels being written, suggests the interesting question, what is the best book for war time? At the front, we are told, the demand is for literature that diverts the mind from its immediate environment, for the book that means "something different." The "war book," even at its typical best, would find few, if any, readers "over there." Even away from the front it is a question if the world is not in need of the occasional mental diversion that a book, written purely for entertainment, is calculated to bring. War books are needed unquestionably; there is no doubt that they will be published in increasing number. But there are other needs in war time that literature can and should supply. A plea should be made for the old-fashioned kind of fiction that has no other purpose than to amuse.

TENDENCIES IN AMERICAN POETRY

TENDENCIES IN MODERN AMERICAN POETRY. By Amy Lowell. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

IT is with peculiar gratitude that we welcome Miss Lowell's "Tendencies in Modern American Poetry." In it she takes up six living poets: Edwin Arlington Robinson, Robert Frost, Edgar Lee Masters, Carl Sandburg, "H. D.," and John Gould Fletcher, and relates them to that evolution in our poetry which has long been in progress beneath the surface, but which has only of late risen noticeably to attention. These are, of course, not the only poets intimately connected with the evolution, but, as Miss Lowell explains in her preface, the object of the book is not that of comprehensive literary history, but rather to fix for a moment the changing ideals of American poetry by the discussion of a few typical examples—to be in a way an instantaneous photograph of a period in flux.

The important "tendency" which Miss Lowell sees irresistibly deepening and strengthening in American poetry is toward "less concern with dogma and more with truth." Form is a minor consideration. Some of the poets considered cling to the older measures, some employ old or new according to their mood, some are genuine come-outers. But there can be no question of the earnest, absorbing, passionate desire on the part of each to paint the thing as he sees it, not for a problematical God of Things as They Are, but for the liberation of his own soul.

It is a curiously diverse group that is thus bound together by a common dedication, and no small part of the unusual interest of the book comes from Miss Lowell's mingling of biography with criticism, so that we see a hundred threads of ancestry and circumstance that have gone to the weaving of her subjects' personalities blent in the larger pattern of their artistic life. Nothing could be more suggestive than the contrasts between them. Edwin Arlington Robinson and Edgar Lee Masters, for instance, were born in the same year, 1869, yet by the conditions of his nature and his environment the New England poet might almost be the grandfather of the Kansan. Mr. Robinson was born into a world older than that of Mr. Masters to start with, and his attitude toward it reveals not the huge and indiscriminate appetite of youth which will be Mr. Masters's should he live to celebrate his centenary, but the fastidious, slightly captious taste of middle age, wistfully reminiscent now and then of the feasts of boyhood. More than with most men, the heredity and education of these two are a key to their work. Miss Lowell's idyllic picture of the Maine town where Mr. Robinson grew up makes it easy to understand how the very fibres of his being were entwined with the order of an elder world than ours. Yet the Spring flood of the planet caught him up and carried him away. He is a poet who will never be completely appreciated; even his admirers are compelled to a mental reservation. His is the tragedy of final ineffectualness which always follows a divided allegiance. A man cannot stand between two eras and be enthusiastically acclaimed by either, and when he is also a genius his situation becomes the more poignant. Then he is, indeed, > * * * the last god going home

> Unto his last desire, and never finding it.

Mr. Masters, on the other hand, was born into the politically and socially uneasy Middle West of nearly a half century ago. Miss Lowell comments incisively upon the hit-or-miss character of his schooling:

> A smattering of many subjects is not education, and Edgar Masters's mind at this juncture was a lamentable jumble of smitherings. It was like a Christmas tree, hung with bits of tinsel in unrelated splotches. To a certain extent, this is true of the poet of today. His mind glitters, but it is without cohesion.

As a youth his inner and his outer life were constantly at variance, and naturally he grew up to be a poet of revolt. But his revolts are not moral revolts. In the "Spoon River Anthology" the moral turpitude of his characters affects him not at all. It is the hideous monotony of their lives, driving them to monotonous transgression, which fires him to a white heat of indignant irony. Perhaps that is why he has no remedy to offer. Legislation may affect conduct, revolution the social fabric, but neither will make ugliness less ugly.

Compared with these two poets, in whom cause and effect have worked with visible logic, the early life of Robert Frost turns as blank a face to the inquirer as the ancestry of Melchisedek. It will be a surprise to many of his readers to learn that he was born in the picturesque and eventful San Francisco of over forty years ago, and passed his early boyhood there, "scampering up and down its hills, running in and out of newspaper offices, jostling against the somewhat rough and very determined men of the place and period." A surprise, because it seems to have left as little trace upon him as though it had taken place in a previous incarnation. Later on he lived in Lawrence, Mass., and even worked as bobbin boy in a mill there, at a time when its diversity of races was less of a commonplace than it is now. But the mingled strains of Slav, Latin, and Celt appear to have impressed his imagination not at all. And among the New England hill-farms upon which he has since lavished his exclusive passion, the alien strains which are gradually replacing the early stock are wellnigh as non-existent to him as the race of fairies. The cause of the phenomenon—for it is nothing less—may be found in Miss Lowell's comparison of him with Edwin Arlington Robinson; "Mr. Robinson is one of the most intellectual poets writing in America today; Mr. Frost is one of the most intuitive." The influences which predetermine the career and the work of an intellectual man lie on the surface, while with the intuitive man they may be a mystery even to himself.

To the reader who imagines himself little interested in the delicate technical problems of poetry, the chapter on "H. D." and John Gould Fletcher will promise greater opportunities for skipping than any other in the book, but if he employs them he will miss some of the best writing he is likely to meet with in the proverbial day's journey. Very few people, certainly not Miss Lowell herself, would claim that wisdom will die with the Imagists; but, on the other hand, few except those who take the most narrowly conventional view of the art of poetry will deny that they have introduced into it beauty, freshness, and originality. Their accomplishment has not been an easy one. The story of "H. D." and John Gould Fletcher, as related in "Tendencies in Modern American Poetry," is as thrilling in its way as that of the elder adventurers who stood upon their "peak in Darien." The glimpses of "H. D." are both artistically and humanly beautiful and touching. Now we see the "shy, reticent girl plodding up and down the straight Philadelphia streets, bitterly suppressing a desire for beauty which nothing about her satisfied"—now the poet with "a strange, faunlike, dryadlike quality" about her, "as though just startled from a brake of fern," and lastly the woman, married to the poet Richard Aldington, working with him for a while in happy collaboration, then taking his place on the staff of The Egoist when he joined the army and departed for "somewhere in France."

After reading "Tendencies in Modern American Poetry" one is left with the impression—perhaps unintended by the author—that of the six poets discussed only two contain the possibilities of any considerable future growth. They are John Gould Fletcher and Carl Sandburg. The poem on Lincoln which Mr. Fletcher wrote while America's entrance into the war was immediately impending, and which is here quoted in full, proves that he is, as Miss Lowell claims, "delving deeper into life, developing more knowledge and more tenderness." These are the qualities which his earlier work lacks. If he can add them to the wide reach after beauty and the incomparable skill with words which have always characterized him, there is scarcely limit to his possibilities.

With Mr. Sandburg Miss Lowell is less the critic than the candid friend. She says of his "Chicago Poems" that it is "one of the most original books which this age has produced," and again,

> The impression which one gets on reading this book is of a heavy steel-gray torrent open here and there, and, through the vents, shining pools of clear, pale blue. It is a rare and beautiful combination which we find in this volume, under whatsoever simile we describe it. Seldom does such virility go with such tenderness.

On the other hand, she warns him frankly against propaganda, "the pitfall of poets." Perhaps because she feels, though she does not say so, that of all the poets she has considered, Mr. Sandburg is the only one who is still to any extent an unknown quantity who has not, as it were, committed himself to a certain cut of habit for his lifetime, she takes him aside and talks to him privately. She warns him that a philosophy which confuses the individual with all mankind—"We are made of the same stuff; we are going the same way"—is more generous than sound:

> It is only experience that teaches of how many varying stuffs mankind is made. "What is one man's meat is another man's poison" is a truer statement. Mr. Sandburg's desires no more mirror those of the great body of the people than did William Morris's in an earlier generation. He has yet to discover how different they are, and the discovery when made may well be a shattering one.

She even argues with him, man to man, as to what the "great, inarticulate cry of the masses" really is, and assures him that the causes which lie so near his heart are "ephemeral phenomena." She urges upon him the truth that one cannot at the same time serve an ideal of literal, thorough-going democracy and an ideal of art; that art, in its inmost, unchangeable essence, is aristocratic. In a word, she entreats him not ungently and with a full appreciation of the quality of "wide-flying imagination" which is so strikingly characteristic of his work, to be a poet and not a pamphleteer.

This, of course, is not criticism according to the older canons. It stands in about the same relation to that criticism, indeed, as Mr. Sandburg's poem "Chicago" stands to "Yarrow Visited." But it is interesting and vital writing—writing that is truly influential, to use a word that has caught an undeserved tarnish through over-much rubbing against material things.

"Tendencies in Modern American Poetry" is a book that needed to be written, and it is doubtful if any one else in America besides Amy Lowell could have written it. She has brought to the task not only critical insight and independence of spirit, but a personal acquaintance with the poets she has discussed. This has served to enlarge her view, not to guide her judgments. She has little patience with Mr. Robinson when he is long-winded, or with Mr. Masters when he sings of amaranths and scented bowers, or with Mr. Sandburg as a demagogue. But her criticisms leave no sting.

Fighting for Peace

By Henry van Dyke

After a photograph Copyright by Pirie MacDonald
Henry van Dyke

A vivid view of the origin, conditions and right conclusion of the war, from the standpoint of one who was very close to it and who had intimate personal experiences which illuminate the subject with the light of reality.

Henry van Dyke was Minister to Holland from June, 1913, to February, 1917; he was right at the heart of affairs in a neutral country, with Germany on one border and Belgium on the other. No man had a better chance to see and feel the whole tremendous situation. Since he resigned his diplomatic post Dr. van Dyke has visited under the best circumstances the French and British war fronts, and in England he has been in communication with the leading men.

A Lieutenant in a United States Army Camp writes: "Each chapter has quickened my zeal (already adequate, I had thought!) and made me a better and happier soldier. I thank God that you were permitted to resign your post, that you might write these things."

THE publishers are pretty well agreed that although the war has well-nigh killed interest in books of travel concerning European countries it has stimulated the interest of Americans in their own country and in those of Latin America. Especially has interest increased in the possibilities afforded by the United States for those who would go holiday making. And that interest, it would seem, has not been lessened by our own entrance into the war, for all these books brought together here tell of the interests and the pleasures to be found by journeying round about the United States, with excursions into the lands of our neighbors to the north and the south of us.

Robert Sterling Yard's book, "The Top of the Continent," has for its purpose the interesting of Americans in the wonders of our great series of national parks in the Rocky and Sierra Nevada mountain ranges. He writes with knowledge, for he is himself connected with the National Park Service, and his book comes forth under the auspices of the Department of the Interior. Secretary Lane writes a brief foreword in which he emphasizes the value of our national parks considered as a part of our educational system. "They tell the history," he says, "of the making of the continent, where the primal forces may yet be seen in action. They give a liberal education in beauty and in nobility. Men cannot think meanly in the presence of the cañons and cliffs, the mountains and the cataracts, of our parks." Mr. Yard puts his narrative into the form of a story in which a family from Philadelphia, numbering two lively children and several grown-ups, go holiday making through all one Summer, visiting the Rocky Mountain, the Mesa Verde, the Yellowstone, the Glacier National Parks, Mount Rainier, Crater Lake, the Yosemite, the Sequoias, and the Grand Cañon. They have many exciting adventures, there is the rose color touch of a little romance, and in the course of their conversations they tell one another and the children all the important and interesting facts and legends about each place they visit. The volume ought to prove both informative and interesting to all who have a particle of curiosity about or pride in their own country, whether or not they expect to take a similar journey. For those who contemplate a trip to any one or all of the places described it will serve as an excellent guide book. For young people there could be no better gift volume. It is copiously illustrated from excellent photographs.

The journey which Paul Leland Haworth took "On the Headwaters of Peace River," a thousand-mile canoe trip in the northern wilderness of the Canadian Rockies, is not one that would be practicable for the ordinary traveler, but his narrative will fascinate lovers of adventure and those many readers for whom accounts of travel in wild and beautiful regions have a never-flagging interest. Mr. Haworth's story of his trip is peculiarly delightful because of his own zest in every experience and in every inspiring sight of mountain, glacier, forest, or noble river, and because of his faculty for having interesting experiences and meeting people who had had strange and varied contacts with life and nature and were willing to talk about them. Outfitting at Edmonton, and making his start, with one man, from Hansard, on the Fraser River, he followed the Crooked and the Parsnip Rivers to the junction of the latter with the Finlay to make the mighty Peace River, and then went on up the Finlay and well into the country of the Quaicha River, where the author thinks they were the first white men to penetrate. The many beautiful and interesting pictures are from photographs taken by the author.

A year ago Miss Hildegarde Hawthorne gave the public a very charming book which told of her visits to "Old Seaport Towns of New England." This new volume is uniform in appearance and in spirit with its predecessor, and those who enjoyed that work may feel assured that they will be equally delighted with this. She began her rambling journey last April, first starting southward in order to see some of the famous college towns in a region where early Spring would proffer sun and warmth. The University of Virginia first claimed her attention, then William and Mary at Williamsburg, and afterward Annapolis. Then she came northward to Princeton, Yale, Brown, and Harvard, and, this being the twentieth century, included Wellesley in her pilgrimage, went on to Bowdoin, Dartmouth, and Amherst, visited Smith at Northampton, saw Williams, crossed over to Poughkeepsie to inspect Vassar, then came down the river to West Point, and finished her pilgrimage at Cornell. It is the sort of thing for which Miss Hawthorne has a particularly happy faculty. Her mood responds sensitively to every appeal of landscape, tradition, human sentiment, the everlasting joyousness of youth, beauty of building or of setting. Her sense of humor is always keen and its expression genial and sunny, while she herself is a "good mixer" and reports with picturesqueness and good feeling the little passages and fraternizings with men and women and children of all sorts into which she is continually adventuring. She has made of her rambles another delightful book in which the reader will find not only a charming account of journeys to interesting places, but also plenty of information, well camouflaged in the telling, about the colleges and college towns that she visits. The illustrations, printed in pale tint, from drawings by John Albert Seaford, are beautiful and interesting.

Henry Collins Brown, editor of "Valentine's Manual," has put his notable knowledge of our metropolis to excellent use and has done a real public service by preparing the little handbook, "New York of Today," which visitors to the city will find of the greatest helpfulness, while New Yorkers themselves—most of them—could with much benefit spend some time reading its pages. For it is a comprehensive account, written with knowledge, taste, and discrimination, of New York's important streets, squares, buildings, places of historic interest, the narrative carrying always a background of history, while across the story move the figures of prominent men and women of both former and present times. Full-page plates in tint and color are numerous, and an interesting feature is a folded panoramic picture contrasting the waterfront view of lower Manhattan forty years ago and now.

It would be hard to find anywhere in America roads richer in historical interest than those that lead out feom Philadelphia, and John T. Faris in his book has told the story of them well. He takes his readers along the King's Highway to Wilmington, over the Baltimore Turnpike, the Gulph Road, the turnpikes to Westchester and Lancaster, the old Germantown Road, the road to Bethlehem, the Ridge Road to Perkiomen, the old York Road, and that to Bristol and Trenton. On each one he tells about the famous historical events that happened along its way, the important men and women who have traversed it, points out the features of local interest both now and during former times, and mentions its beauties of landscape. He well says that Philadelphia enjoys an advantage over other American cities in the historical interest of its surroundings, because of the fact that so many of its old buildings are still practically in the state in which they were a century or more ago. His pages are enriched and varied by many extracts from works written by or about people identified with the localities described or from books concerned with those regions. There are many illustrations and maps.

Another jolly volume, in spirit similar to his former book, "Abroad at Home," is the result of a journey which Mr. Street and Mr. Morgan took through the South, visiting, among the many stops of their winding, leisurely progress, Baltimore, Richmond, Charleston, Birmingham, Atlanta, Memphis, Vicksburg, Savannah, Montgomery, New Orleans. These two trips seem to have been in the nature of a discovery of America for Mr. Street, and he has done a service for those of his countrymen who are equally ignorant of Western and Southern regions by telling what he saw and learned. Especially is this true with regard to the South, with which this new book is concerned, because all the other parts of the United States know so little about that part of the common country. Mr. Street goes on these adventuring travels with very wide-open eyes and an honest mind, and he tells frankly what he sees and hears and learns, rarely failing to invest it with more or less of the whimsical humor which is the salient characteristic of his mental endowments. In a little foreword written with exquisitely fine feeling he speaks of the North's lack of understanding of the South and urges more consideration for the feelings of that region. His own enjoyment of his leisurely journey and the captivating way in which he writes of it ought certainly to help to bring about that result. Mr. Morgan's illustrations catch the spirit and charm of the scenes he portrays.

Miss Crane's "Old Seaport Towns of the South" does for that region what Miss Hawthorne's volume last year did for the North. Visiting Baltimore, Norfolk, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, St. Augustine, Tampa, Pensacola, Mobile, Galveston, and Key West, she writes about them with vivacity and humor and keen interest in human beings of every sort. She has brought together a great variety of bits of history, tradition, reminiscence, and description which make of each place that she visits a very interesting, attractive, and colorful picture. The illustrations, in tint and color, from Mr. Cram's drawings depict unique little characteristic scenes.

The very beautiful book about "The Dwelling Houses of Charleston" carries between its covers a real treasure of interest, historical, biographical, and architectural. The author tells the story of Charleston and of the important families of its earlier years, and against this background of the rise of a community she shows how the architecture of the city was modified by the conditions of the place and of the passing years, until it developed local characteristics which finally resulted in a distinctive style.

VOTING AND SPENDING THE NATION'S MONEY

THE NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM. By Charles Wallace Collins. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

THIS book appeared just as Congress was passing "the largest money bills in the history of the world," as the newspapers declared. It occurred to nobody to remark that no other country votes money without some sort of a plan, without considering the taxes in connection with the expenditures, and without control of the expenditures by the body providing the funds. In all other countries the Executive controls the preparation of the money bills, and presents them to the Legislature as a whole in connection with the provision of taxes necessary to meet the expenses. Ratification is left to the Legislature, which assumes also power of audit to assure itself that the money is used as authorized. Some twenty billions has just been voted by our Congress in the customary manner, but with unusual peremptoriness. It is fresh in the public mind that there never was a single estimate of totals wanted. The Department requisitions came along one after the other, and sometimes there was more than one from the same department. After all departments were provided for there was a deficiency bill for millions, and there is a deficiency after the deficiency bill. Congress as usual did what it pleased with the estimates, increasing, decreasing, rewriting as it saw fit. The Treasury deals with the estimates in a clerical manner. The Secretary of the Treasury is not a finance minister, and has no authority over the department estimates. He cannot alter or even criticise them. He has no authority to control extravagance, nor even to suggest control to Congress. His functions amid this financial anarchy is mechanical. The departments are not coordinated in their finances any more than they are in their functions, and each of them is jealous of all the others.

The President and the Cabinet Secretaries are equally impotent. Neither he nor they control the Government expenses except through the President's veto, and that is used under conditions limiting its application. Often it is necessary to approve a money bill which contains items that would be disapproved if they stood alone. Fourteen independent committees of the House, and fifteen of the Senate deal separately with the requisitions which the departments present separately. Eighteen of these committees deal with the appropriation bills, the other eleven committees report the bills for pensions, buildings, river and harbor improvements, and other demands upon the Treasury. Still another committee of each House prepares the revenue bills. Inasmuch as it is of the essence of a budget that it shall present a summary of all expenses and all resources in a single statement, so that they may be considered in their relations to each other, it follows that the United States has no budget.

The explanation is that our Constitution gives to the House the power of initiative, and to the Senate the power of revision. Each House stands firmly upon its prerogative, although neither has the intimate knowledge of the Government's finances which is possessed by the departments. The practice is to take the last appropriation bills and to modify them by advice given by department officials summoned for the purpose. Cabinet ministers are not summoned, but sometimes volunteer. The Congressmen are not experts in Government finance, but they do not hesitate to alter the department recommendations either in detail or in matters of broad policy. Neither the committees nor the Houses confer with each other. The only rudiment of financial policy is in party caucuses, and here again there is duplication both for the separate parties and for the separate Houses. There is no joint caucus, nor any caucus to consider all financial proposals together. There is never at any time anything like a balance sheet prepared for our billion-dollar country. After the appropriations are passed in the piecemeal manner indicated the experts go over them and assemble the unrelated items. Then for the first time is known the totals for the various departments. Congress proposes, but the Executive disposes. The world-practice is just contrary. In other countries the Executive proposes and the Legislature disposes.

After the money is provided in this anarchical manner it is spent in equal freedom of control. There is a perfunctory audit by the Treasury Auditors. They do no more at best than compare the expenditure with the statutes and verify the arithmetic. All of them are appointed by the Executive which spends the money. They are subject to removal by the Executive, and in fact do change with party changes. Their tenure is political, and they do not hold office long enough to acquire experience. From time to time there are investigations of scandals in spending Government funds. Usually they are partisan in character and procedure, and their findings are contentious. If sound, they are no such deterrent upon financial profligacy as would be the certainty that all financial accounts would be scrutinized, independently, after the money is spent. Congress is jealous of its independence of the Executive, and yet Congress neglects to use a check upon the Executive more controlling than the function of initiating money bills. Groping after a better way is seen in the Republican movement for a committee upon the conduct of the war. The President rightly checked this proposal, for it was a plan to hamper him rather than to co-operate with him. Nevertheless the subject is not dead, the latest Washington telegrams saying that it will lead to a program of the next session. At that time it may be hoped that it will lose its character of mere opportune legislation, with a tincture of partisanship and antagonism between branches of Government in time of war. In that form it is indefensible. It would be more meritorious if it took the form of establishment of something like the Court of Accounts, as in France, or the establishment of a new sort of audit of Treasury accounts by the Legislature, as in England. The British manner is to check the finances of the party in power through a committee under the chairmanship of the opposition. That is neither mere opportunism, nor partisanship, nor scandal hunting. In that form the President might even propose rather than oppose a measure which contains the promise of saving him from the sure but obscure dangers of spending billions.

There are false friends of the spending power who would moderate their activities, who would take a chance of an investigation which might not be ordered, and which perhaps could be controlled if ordered, but who would fear more their ordeal before a committee representing the views of such critics of our money methods as Senator Weeks or Representative Fitzgerald. In reply the friends of the President were unable to urge anything except the duty of patriots not to embarrass the Executive in times like these. When the subject recurs Mr. Collins's book will be useful reinforcement of the friends of budget reform through its clear and authoritative account of the methods of other nations.

MARMADUKE

MARMADUKE. By Flora Annie Steel. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.40 net.

A VERY improbable and old-fashioned, but not altogether unentertaining, novel is the new story called "Marmaduke." But though it is the hero who gives his name to the volume, the book is dominated throughout by the heroine, Marrion Paul. The scene is laid in Scotland during the middle of the last century, and the hero is Captain the Honorable Marmaduke Muir, second son of the wicked and remarkable Lord Drummuir, and probable heir to his ancient title and estate, the eldest son being unmarried and a weakling. Marrion Paul is the granddaughter of Lord Drummuir's head piper and general majordomo, and she and Marmaduke had played together as children. When the book opens they meet for the first time after his ten years' absence in India, and from that moment their destinies are closely intermingled. Marmaduke, though strong in body, is feeble in character, and does not really amount to much, but Marrion's is an ennobling influence. Moreover, she has a talent for managing people, and likes to use it.

From Scotland the action of the tale shifts for a while to the East, and we are given a glimpse of the opening of the Crimean War and the battle of Inkerman, where 8,000 English troops held 60,000 Russians at bay until "in the nick of time 6,000 French troops arrived at the double" and turned mere resistance into victory. Through scenes of fire and pestilence the heroine moves, a veritable angel of mercy and right hand to the overworked Scottish doctor. But, though she is brave and good, the time comes when she realizes that during "her long years of self-sacrifice eve y step she had taken was a mistake," and that by "playing Providence" to other people she had perhaps greatly injured the being she loved best. It all comes out right in the end, however, as the reader has from the beginning been quite sure it would.

GRACE LORRAINE

GRACE LORRAINE: A Romance of an American Millionaire. By Douglas Sladen. New York: Brentano's. $1.40.

Grace Lorraine is not an American millionaire, but a member of the British aristocracy; nor is this novel her story in as complete a sense as the title would make us believe. It is a curious production, not merely because its subject-matter is as full of oddities as of complications, but because there are passages of vivid quality strangely hidden by unnecessary and often uninteresting detail.

The heroine's father is the founder of the "Via Pacis," a restored monastery which he has turned into a refuge for impecunious artists, who are his pensioners. When this worthy loses his money and appoints himself master of this remarkable institution, the property falls into the hands of an American millionaire. This gentleman, the caricature familiar to readers of British fiction, is intensely repugnant to Grace, whose horror at her reduced state is very well realized. He turns out to be the deus ex machina, however, who rescues Grace not merely from her unaccustomed poverty but from a personal relation whose difficulties form the main problem and interest of the book.

There is a great deal of fascinating material here of which the author has not taken advantage. The pensioners figure as far more important people for Grace than they do for the reader, and are on the whole a rather unconvincing set. Grace herself is said to be a charming creature; but the mere fact that a likable if uncultured youth desires her for his wife, despite her propensity to be a bluestocking, does not make her more obviously delightful. Indeed, this boy and Hestia Myrtle, writer of musical comedy and friend and enemy of the austere Grace, are the most clearly drawn characters in the volume. The fact of war enters into the book and complicates the situation, but it is treated so incidentally that the novel might almost be an ante-bellum one. It is more like a sketch for a novel than the actuality, because it is so full of interesting relations which are almost covered by a mass of dull irrelevancies. The conclusion is so incredible as to be quite unsatisfactory.

EXTRICATING OBADIAH

EXTRICATING OBADIAH. By Joseph C. Lincoln. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co. $1.50 net.

Obadiah Burgess was a singularly guileless individual. He had formerly been ship's cook for Captain Noah Newcomb, and he regarded his old chief as the most remarkable of men, which was lucky for Obadiah. He had inherited a few thousand dollars and a house on Cape Cod from an aunt, and for a while was very happy indeed. But no sooner did he come to take possession of his property than a swarm of cheats and schemers descended upon him like so many locusts. They got him into a good deal of trouble, but fool though he was, he had sense enough to send for Captain Noah Newcomb, and the Captain, being a shrewd as well as a kindly and humorous individual, spent some time on the task of "extricating Obadiah."

While thus employed, he found plenty of spare moments in which to help a pair of young lovers, rescue an unhappy youth, conduct a successful courtship of his own, and teach a pair of scoundrels several much-needed lessons. He is a likable character, often amusing, and not too exaggerated to be credible—not even when he is trying to learn how to run an automobile of the type irreverently known as a flivver. The simple little story is familiar and commonplace, and the reader discovers the truth about Mrs. Mayo long before the Captain does, but it is a fairly entertaining tale, nevertheless, and Mr. Lincoln's admirers will no doubt give it a warm welcome.

WILLIAM AND WILLIAMINA

WILLIAM AND WILLIAMINA. By Frances R. Sterrett. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co. $1.40 net.

William Kirwin, a bachelor living a hermit life and thoroughly disgusted with existence in general, one morning found a baby asleep in a rowboat. Although he did his best, he was unable to discover the child's parents, so he took care of her and named her Williamina. All this happened some nine years before the story opens, at which time William and Williamina are living happily together in a shack on the river bank a few miles from the little country town of Mifflin. And if old Peter Knox hadn't died and left his cottage to his young cousin Helen Spafford, they might have gone on living in their quiet way. But after Helen arrived other people came. They did not entirely approve—and no wonder—of the way William lived, and they thought Williamina needed a mother. Their efforts to discover her identity greatly worried William and Williamina, but of course it all ended happily, with no less than three love affairs.

Williamina is a remarkable child, who makes friends with every one and is extremely fortunate. When she picks up a tramp he does not steal the spoons, but proves an expert French cook, and remains to adore her and to cook for her. Still, she is amusing at times, and not quite so aggressively virtuous as some children in fiction. The most likable characters in the book are Dr. Grey and Marietta. William being a sort of masculine old maid. There are some entertaining bits in the book, but it is neither as lively nor as entertaining as some of its author's earlier work.

JEFFERSON GAWNE

THE VENGEANCE OF JEFFERSON GAWNE. By C. A. Seltzer. Chicago: A. C. McClurg & Co. $1.35.

This is a swiftly moving story of the fight of one man against a townful of cattle thieves and rustlers, and his emergence as master not merely over the lawless settlement but over his own brooding bitterness as well. Gawne had hated women ever since his brother was left with a gunwound in his side by a faithless wife and her lover. Yet his vengeance on the sex is influenced by the softening of his passions with the coming of a woman into his own life. The book is dominated by this man, just as he dominates the people in it. But it is not a study of character; every one in the tale, including the hero, might figure in a wild west show without even a sharpening of outlines.

It is more like a moving picture than a novel, one dramatic instant following another in a breathless succession of jealous intrigues and passionate encounters. It has all the qualities of a photoplay; the swiftness of events, the excitement of primitive battle for love and power, the brandishing of pistols, the rides into the desert, the devious plots of contriving villains, and the final triumph of the doughty hero. It has as well the peculiar character of the "movies" in that it carries one along, willy-nilly, bestowing its crude thrills and simple satisfactions like a turning reel, and leaving one as little troubled and perhaps more gratified. This effect is increased by the character of the illustrations, by P. V. E. Ivory, who has drawn several dramatic pictures in which lovely girls, horses, fierce men, and pistols pre-eminently figure.

modern poets" represented in "The Catholic Anthology" are wholly without favorable mention. This in itself might argue only a too inclusive taste, but Mr. Braithwaite does not stop there. His taste is not only inclusive but levelling; not in the sense of casting down the mighty to the ranks of the commonalty, but of exalting the commonalty to the seats of the mighty. No reader will object, for instance, to his praise of Rabindranath Tagore, but to conclude his panegyric with the bracket

"He bathes the spirit in the lustral waters of eternity," remarked Psyche.
"And the only American poet I have met with this year doing the same is Olive Tilford Dargan," Jason added, savors somewhat of anticlimax.

Again, Mr. Braithwaite speaks justly enough of Madeline Bridges and of Louis Untermeyer in his lighter moods, and quotes delicious fragments from "—— and Other Poets." Yet over the page he says of a certain H. Stanley Haskins that he "hits off a humorous situation with true distinction," and quotes in proof a "Feminist Alphabet," one couplet of which runs

H is for HUSBAND, with resolute jaw,
Who, when you have children, is required by law,

And of another young humorist our anthologist observes, "I do want to quote this rather delicious exposition on the various religious sects," and proceeds to do so at length.

Since the book is largely conversation, the style is naturally colloquial. And that is an excellent style, as Hazlitt proved, if the author happens to be a good talker. One fears that Mr. Braithwaite is not. Such a phrase as "and intoxicants we are becoming by the gifts of a few wise modern poets" may be laid to careless proofreading. But what shall we say of a sentence like this, introducing the subject of Miss Amelia Josephine Burr's new book?

"Suppose you give us a little lecture on Miss Burr's poetry," suggested Jason.
"You know I caught a glimpse of her once in Rome, traveling with her mother. I think it was the same year I ran across Louis V. Ledoux and his charming wife in Italy just before they started for Spain, and he told me of having met A. E. Housman of the 'Shropshire Lad' on a train, and that the Englishman confessed that the only American poet he knew was Witter Bynner."

And though slang, like adversity, hath its uses, surely they are not to be looked for in a paragraph of serious and philosophic criticism. "Carcassone may be any old place or any old thing in the life of a man or woman" looks strange enough in a sentence following one which contains the name of Henry James.

But good books have been written in a worse style than Mr. Braithwaite's. His greatest fault is his vast indiscriminateness. It leads him not only to promiscuous praise, but to page after page of description and comment which have no connection whatever with the matter in hand. Mr. Braithwaite is too conscientious a writer consciously to pad a book, yet "The Poetic Year" is thick with padding. Perhaps his very conscientiousness is at fault. For years he has tilled a reluctant soil to poetical fruitfulness, and it is small wonder that he should feel a personal fondness and responsibility for every green shoot that soil produces. Small wonder (but a great pity) that his fondness and his zeal should lead him to overfertilization and to hesitate at the cruel kindness of thinning!

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES

As any one might know by mention of "F. P. A." as the author, this is a delightful book. It is so full of a number of things! It is amusing in so many different ways, with so sly and whimsical a humor. It pokes fun at people, and things, and pretensions, and customs. It translates Horace, of course, in the words of the most modern slang. It parodies Amy Lowell to the tune of a taxi meter, and Sara Teasdale to the accompaniment of the tender attentions of mosquitos on Riverside Drive. It tells the tale of a baseball game as seen by "Our Own Mr. Ruggles," and presents bits of "anthologies" after the manner of Edgar Lee Masters. It sings in goodly rhyme and rhythm the ballades of divers "strange adventures" in which the usual unexpected ending is dispensed with and everything turns out, mirabile dictu, precisely as might have been foreseen. It retells the tale of "Jenny Kissed Me" in the words of Arnold Bennett, and carols "It's a Long Way to Tipperary" after the manner of James Oppenheim, Eugene Field, A. E. Housman, and the translators of Horace and Xenophon. It turns "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes" into free verse; and eke "Jack Spratt" and "Little Miss Muffet." And it contains many a gay, trilling verse that defies classification, such as this gem of human understanding:

O Brotherhood of Engineers,
O Brotherhood of Train-and-Firemen,
Gaze on the suppliant salty tears
Wept by this lowliest of the lyremen.

O mighty railroad Presidents,
Debating how to help the nation
By saving corporate expense—
Harken to mine interrogation:

What is there in the common law,
The statutes of exchange and barter,
From Portland to Communipaw,
What is there in the railroad's charter—

What is there—something, I am sure;
What is there—this my query weighty—
That makes you keep the temperature
Of so-called sleeping cars at 80?

MARK TWAIN AS A LETTER WRITER

expressed his thanks for a volume of Kipling's verse:

I have been reading "The Bell Buoy" and Kipling's work—and saving up the rest for other leisurely and luxurious meals. A bell buoy is a deeply impressive fellow-being. In these many recent trips up and down the Sound in the Kanawha, (Mr. Rogers's yacht,) he talked to me nightly, sometimes in his pathetic and melancholy way, sometimes with his strenuous and urgent note, and I got his meaning—now I have his words! No one but Kipling could do this strong and vivid thing. Some day I hope to hear the poem chanted or sung—with the bell buoy breaking in out of the distance.

And here, finally, is a part of the letter to me about Sir Walter Scott:

I haven't been out of my bed for four weeks, but—well, I have been reading a good deal, and it occurs to me to ask you to sit down, some time or other when you have eight or nine months to spare, and let me down a certain few literary particulars for my help and elevation. Your time need not be thrown away, for at your further leisure you can make Columbian lectures out of the results and do your students a good turn.

1. Are there in Sir Walter's novels passages done in good English—English which is neither slovenly or involved?
2. Are there passages whose English is not poor and thin and commonplace, but is of a quality above that?
3. Are there passages which burn with real fire—not punk, fox-fire, make believe?
4. Has he heroes and heroines who are not cads and cadesses?
5. Has he personages whose acts and talk correspond with their charactere as described by him?
6. Has he heroes and heroines whom the reader admires, admires and knows why?
7. Has he funny characters that are funny, and humorous passages that are humorous?
8. Does he ever claim the reader's interest, and make him reluctant to lay the book down?
9. Are there pages where he ceases from posing, ceases from admiring the placid flood and flow of his own dilutions, ceases from being artificial, and is for a time, long or short, recognizably sincere and in earnest?
10. Did he know how to write English, and didn't do it because he didn't want to?
11. Did he use the right word only when he couldn't think of any other one, or did he run so much to wrong because he didn't know the right one when he saw it?
12. Can you read him and keep your respect for him? Of course a person could in his day—an era of sentimentality and sloppy romantics—but land! can a body do it today?

WITH AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS

LIEUTENANT CONINGSBY DAWSON, author of "Carry On," whose articles on "Literature in the Trenches" in the AUTUMN BOOK NUMBER OF THE NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW will be remembered, has returned to Europe, arriving in London last Sunday. He was wounded in battle a year ago and the wound developed so bad a case of gas gangrene that the surgeons decided to amputate his arm as the only means of saving his life. He refused to permit the operation, finally recovered, and saved his arm also. While convalescing he spent several months in the United States.

Ralph Connor, who, as Chaplain of the Forty-third Cameron Highlanders of Canada, has been since the beginning of the war Major Charles W. Gordon, has written a war novel, "The Major," which the Dorans have ready for immediate publication. By means of the life story of a Canadian boy who grows up in the novel, enlists when the war comes, and goes to the front, the author has tried to show the sources of the valor, the gallant fighting spirit, and fortitude of the Canadian soldiers.

By way of showing to American readers something of the spirit that animates the Italian armies, Klyda Richardson Steege, an American woman who has lived in Italy for many years, has made a collection of letters written to their friends at home by Italian soldiers of all ranks and of all social degrees, which will be published shortly by E. P. Dutton & Co. under the title "We of Italy."

Wilfrid Wilson Gibson recently made his fourth attempt to enlist in the English Army, and, after having been rejected three times, was accepted for service. It is rumored that he will have a new book of poems ready for publication in the Spring.

The Macmillans announce the early publication of a book, written before the opening of the war by Donald Hankey, whose "Student in Arms" has been widely read and discussed. It will be called "The Church and the Man," and is said to deal with the average man and his attitude toward religion.

On the day of the publication of his handbook for recruits, "The Cantonment Manual," Major W. G. Kilner, its author, was promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Colonel and attached to the staff of Brig. Gen. Faloia, who is in France.

Arthur Stacey Riggs, author of "France from Sea to Sea," who lately returned from three months in the trenches of France and Belgium, has started upon a lecture tour of the country which will carry him from the eastern to the western coast. His subject will be various phases of the war. He is also at work upon a new book treating of certain human and moral aspects of the war, among them the psychology behind the atrocities committed by the German soldiers, to which he has devoted a great deal of study.

"Rising Japan," which the Putnams will publish shortly, is a study of the developments and spirit of that nation by the Rev. Jabez T. Sunderland, who has twice spent a year or more in the Island Kingdom, the last time in 1913-1914 as Billings lecturer in Japan, China, and India. The book will have a foreword by Lindsey Russell, President of the Japan Society.

The ninety-seventh anniversary of the birth of George Eliot occurs this week, and Lina Wright Beede's "George Eliot and Thomas Hardy," which Mitchell Kennerley will issue this month, is in a certain measure in celebration of the date. The book is a study and comparison of the women characters of the two novelists.

"Grimm's Fairy Tales," which have just been brought out in a new edition illustrated by Louis Rhead by the Harpers, are a little more than one hundred years old in their collected form. The two Grimm brothers gathered them from many sources and published them in 1812 under the title "Children's and Household Tales." George Cruikshank illustrated the first English version which appeared in 1823.

"Germany's 'Annexationist' Aims" is another indictment of Germany out of her own mouth, which E. P. Dutton & Co. have ready for immediate publication. It has been translated, abbreviated, arranged, and introduced by J. Ellis Barker from a voluminous work by S. Grumbach, a German publicist, that was published at Lausanne early in the present year. Herr Grunbach brought together an enormous quantity of extracts from German books, periodicals, newspapers, and public men, showing that every stratum of German thought and life had been for years looking forward to increase of territory through a successful war. Mr. Barker, who has put the book into English form, has long been recognized as an authority on German politics, life, and literature.

The Fleming H. Revell Company announces the early publication of a biography of Alice Gordon Gulick, an American woman who did brilliant work as a Christian educator in Spain. A graduate of Mount Holyoke and later the wife of the Rev. William Hooker Gulick, she as a missionary under the Woman's Board of the Congregational Church worked for many years in Spain. She Institute Internacional in Madrid and the Colegio Internacional in Barcelona are outgrowths of her efforts. The publication of her biography marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Institute. The book has been written by her sister, Elizabeth Putnam Gordon.

The James T. White Company of 70 Fifth Avenue has engaged in the venture of bringing out a series of volumes of American poetry. The first, by Edward Cowles, is a recent publication, and others to appear in rapid succession will be respectively by Amelia Burr, Clinton Scollard, and Blanche Shoemaker Wagstaff.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS

ANSWERS BY THE EDITOR

R. H. C.—Will you please print the name of the author of the following lines and the title of the poem from which they are taken?

Seven hundred years and fifty-three
Had Rome been growing up in might,
And now was queen of land and sea.
No sound was heard of clashing wars,
Peace brooded o'er the hushed domain;
Apollo, Pallas, Jove, and Mars,
Held undisturbed their ancient reign,
In the solemn midnight centuries ago.

The lines quoted above comprise practically the first stanza of "A Christmas Hymn" by Alfred Domett, (1811-1887,) who was a distinguished British colonial statesman and who for over thirty years held important political offices in New Zealand. "A Christmas Hymn," his best known poem, was printed in Blackwood's Magazine in 1837. His chief poetical work is "Ranolf and Amohia, a South Sea Day Dream," which appeared in 1872, and in which the author described the wonderful scenery in New Zealand, and the legends, character, and habits of the Maori inhabitants. In 1877 he published a volume of poetry entitled "Flotsam and Jetsam: Rhymes Old and New." A poem entitled "Venice," by Domett, was published in 1839.

Domett was born at Camberwell Grove, Surrey, England, and was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was called to the bar in 1841, and the following year settled in New Zealand. He was a great friend of Robert Browning, and his departure from England was mourned by Browning in the poem "Waring." Domett filled in succession nearly all the chief administrative offices in New Zealand, including Secretary to the Colony in 1851 and that of Prime Minister, 1862-1863. He retired to private life in 1871, and returned to England, where he died in 1887.

Southern Literary Messenger

J. D. W.—What is the value of copies of the Southern Literary Messenger published in Richmond, Va., during the forties and containing contributions by Edgar Allan Poe?

This magazine has a value of from $5 to $10 a volume for the earlier years of its existence. Poe was the associate editor of the magazine from August, 1835, until January, 1837, and the eighteen numbers covered by this period, in good condition, can readily be sold at good prices to collectors of Poe's writings.

Stevenson's "Requiem"

H. R. F.—Will you kindly print the short poem written by Robert L. Stevenson for his epitaph?

The poem for which our correspondent asks is "The Requiem," and is as follows:

Under the wide and starry sky,
Dig the grave and let me lie:
Glad did I live and gladly die,
And I laid me down with a will.

This be the verse you grave for me:
"Here he lies, where he longed to be;
Home is the sailor, home from the sea,
And the hunter home from the hill."

ANSWERS FROM READERS

J. S. CARPENTER.—I am inclosing a copy of one of the poems asked for by "J. L. H." in THE REVIEW of Sept. 23. I do not know the author nor do I know where the poem can be found, as it was sent to me by a friend over three years ago.

BECAUSE HE'S MY FRIEND.

He may be six kinds of a liar,
He may be ten kinds of a fool;
He may be a blooming high-flier
Without any reason or rule.
There may be a shadow above him
Of ruin and woes that impend;
I may not respect, but I love him—
I love him because he's my friend.

I know he has faults by the billion,
But his faults are a portion of him;
I know that his record's vermilion,
He's far from a sweet seraphim—
But he's always been square with "yours truly,"
Ever ready to give or to lend,
And tho' he is wild and unruly
I love him because he's my friend.

I know him, I know, but I do it
The same to his face as away;
And if other folks knock—well, they rue it
And wish they'd had nothing to say.
I never make diagrams of him,
No maps of his soul have I penned;
I don't analyze—I just love him,
Because—well, because he's my friend.

On a Sun Dial

MARY O. GRAY.—In reference to the inscription on a sun dial about which E. C. Frost wrote in your issue of Sept. 30 I have been moved to send you what I have just read on a sun dial in Pittsfield, Mass. It may be what is wanted. I do not know the author, but these are the words:

Let others tell of storms and showers,
I'll only mark your sunny hours.

Door in the Wall

P. H. PARR.—The story referred to by "J. D. L." in The Book Review for Aug. 19 was published in the Premier Magazine (London) either last year or the one before. So far as I remember it was entitled "The Door in the Wall," and was by Jerome K. Jerome, but I am not certain. Anyway, it was one of a short set of unusually high-grade short stories written by prominent authors.

A Friend or Two

ELNORE J. COOK.—Referring to the appeal of R. J. Taylor in your issue of Oct. 28 for the poem in which the lines "A little love and laughter—many tears" appear it is probable that it might be the poem "A Friend or Two," by Wilbur D. Nesbit. It is published in booklet form by F. P. Volland & Co., Chicago, Ill.

"Way Through the Woods"

FRANCES J. SHRIVER.—The poem quoted by James Barron in your Appeals to Readers of Sept. 2, begining:

They shut the road through the woods
Seventy years ago.
Weather and rain have undone it again—is Kipling's "The Way Through the Woods," which introduces the story "Merklete Witches" in the volume "Rewards and Fairies," published by Doubleday, Page & Co.

APPEALS TO READERS

RALIA DONALDSON.—Can any of your readers inform me from what contemporary American fiction is the following quotation?

Mere plants can love the light, but have not the beautiful mercy to share their loveliness with foul places. The human heart is a finer work. It can if it will turn its white light upon darkness, so that out of it even a single seed may take heart and grow. * * * The heart should keep its thousand doors all open, each heartstring a latchstring and each latchstring out.

"Back of the Bread"

P. R. F.—Can any reader name the author and supply the words of the poem, part of which follows?

Back of the bread is the snowy flour,
Back of the flour is the mill,
Back of the mill is the wheat and the shower,
And the sun, and the Father's will.

"America's Prayer"

E. S. WOODWARD.—Can any reader inform me where I may obtain the words of a poem entitled "America's Prayer," and by whom it is written? I have heard it read or sung somewhere, and have only been able to remember the following:

Great God of nations warring now,
Our prayer for courage, strength, and might
Shall rise to thee. Oh, hear our vow,
And aid us to uphold the right.

"Song of the Marines"

F. L. R.—Can any reader supply the lines of "The Song of the Marines," from which the following lines are quoted?

If the army and the navy
Ever come to Heaven's scenes,
They'll find the streets are guarded
By the U. S., Marines.

He Fought for His Own as Would You or I

THERE was a breathless moment of action as the great creatures faced each other. Hatred burned at white heat in each. Every element was supplied for a mighty conflict.

"Foam"—poor Foam, the razor-back of Prunty's farm—had responded to the cry for help that stirs the fighting Boar as the fire bell stirs the fire horse. He had hastened to the spot with all the self-forgetfulness of a noble nature. And what had he found? A sight most terrible—one of his own brood, his very own, being harried by a foe he had held in life-long contempt, the Outlaw Bear of Kogar's Creek!

No instinct of mercy urged the Bear, but hate, relentless hate, and the lust of food. He was the outlaw through and through—his highest delight, plunder. Power, mighty power, lust, insanity and a doubtful courage were here, pitted against lesser power with matchless courage and the lungs and limbs of a warrior trained. Foam fought for his own as would you or I. Read what happened—let the prince of nature-story tellers thrill you through and through!

SILLY BILLY, THE PUP THAT "CAME THROUGH"

"Silly Billy," chuck full of life, always going at racing speed, generally getting into mischief, broken-hearted if his master did not notice him, chewing up clothing, hats and boots, getting kicked in the ribs by horses and tossed by cows, but still the same hilarious, endlessly good-natured, energetic "fool" pup—until he was called to pass his taste in the fiery furnace. And the "fool" pup made good.

You get all the force and wonder of it from the pen of a real story-teller like Ernest Thompson Seton. He makes you understand and appreciate animal nature just as truly as some of the great novelists make you understand human nature. Mail the coupon.

Brute Society Like Human

Brute society is not really very different from human society. There are rogues among elephants, idlers among beavers, mangy man-eaters among tigers, and outlaws among bears—Kogar's Creek bear was one of these.

And even the smaller animals have their hopes and fears and their big Rubicons like Raggylug's, nor are there always valiant, unselfish mothers like Molly Cottontail behind them. Poor little Molly Cottontail! She was a true heroine, yet only one of unnumbered millions that without a thought of heroism have lived and done their best in their little world, and died. She fought a good fight in the battle of life. She was good stuff; the stuff that never dies. You—your boy—every boy and girl between 8 and 80 must read these amazing, uplifting, inspiring, yet thrilling stories by

ERNEST THOMPSON SETON

How the very scent and flavor of animal life comes up from every volume of Ernest Thompson Seton! He makes you feel the tragedy of Old Sobo, the wolf, roaming the mesas in search of his lost mate—his cry no longer a loud, defiant howl, but a long, plaintive wail!

The silent fascination of the wilderness, the fierce struggles of the animal folk—their passions and tragedies and adventures—the whole wonderful romance of the woods and their people—these are the things that this prince of story-tellers brings straight home to you. His books are sheer delight to all of us who have kept the heart of youth and something of the glad intensity of nature living.

A Vacation all the Year Round

Memories of the best vacation you ever had come trooping as you read—you live them all over again—and foretastes of all the better vacations you are to have with the new knowledge that only this great nature-lover can give you. Each thing he tells you is based on fact—it is the science of the woods touched with the magic of a romantic pen.

Into the books he has woven hundreds of fascinating details of Indian lore and camp and woodcraft. He shows you the real problems of the forest and how imagination and ingenuity can solve them. He tells you just what things to take on a camping trip, how to find your way in the woods, how to cook over a campfire, how to get pure water in swamp or forest, etc., etc. He gives you the information that makes you as independent in the woods as primitive man—and as care-free and happy as a lark.

Just the Thing for Christmas

What boy or girl wouldn't delight in these stories and in the information packed into them?

There are six volumes, each filled with wonder-knowledge and story. The titles are as follows:

Wild Animals I Have Known
Wild Animals at Home
Wild Animal Ways
The Book of Woodcraft
Two Little Savages
Rolf in the Woods

Make Christmas mean something to the children. Let them feel the wholesome call of the wild, as it is sounded in these books. You cannot find anything more appropriate anywhere, though you search the country over. And these books come to you so easily! They are delivered absolutely free for your examination. No money in advance. You can send them back if you are not satisfied. You are under no obligation.

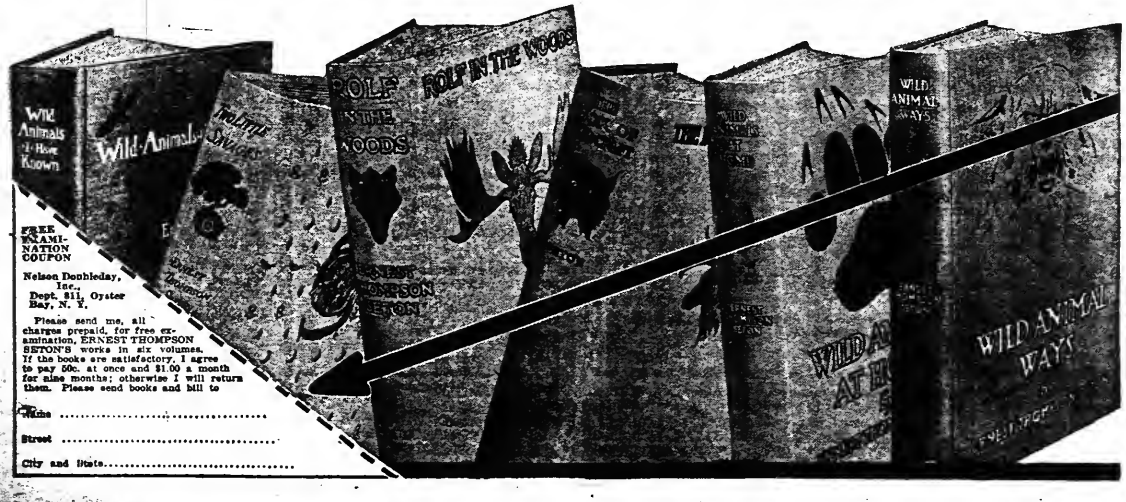
Send Your Christmas Order Now

You can scarcely help being satisfied, the books are in themselves beautiful. They are not ordinary books. They are magnificently made. They are on rich, soft paper, with deep, generous margins. Nearly every page has its own special, exquisite illustrations, and there are full-page half-tone illustrations scattered liberally throughout the books. Each volume has an individual, appropriate design of its own on the side and the back, stamped in two colors and gold. So each volume is a rich and splendid gift book, and the whole makes a luxurious set.

Send your Christmas order now. Don't wait until the present limited edition is exhausted. It is going rapidly, and the next edition cannot possibly be sold at the same low price. Fill out the coupon or write a letter or postal TODAY. Address Nelson Doubleday, Inc., Dept. 811, Oyster Bay, N. Y.

An Education for Your Boy

There is no influence so wholesome for boys as that of animals. If boys learn to love animals they will not be cruel to them. And if they learn to respect the rights and feelings of animals they will as they grow up know better how to respect the rights and feelings of human beings. No boy who reads the book of Ernest Thompson Seton could be unkind to animals—he would understand too thoroughly how much they feel and suffer.



FREE EXAMINATION COUPON

Gazing into the Future

Every woman looks forward to the new season that promises much of pleasures and of triumphs: the season of theatre and opera, of dances, dinners, and luncheons, of love and admiration that ever follow in the wake of beauty.

Face or frock—which weighs heavier in the scales of success? Which will people see first, and which will he continue to see long after the dance is past?

THE POMPEIAN MFG. COMPANY, Cleveland, Ohio

WHEN the leaves have fallen, does your garden lose its charm? Would you like a garden you can enjoy all Winter? A Winter garden is a quiet, reposeful place, a Pine and Fir-scented place, a place illuminated by the white bark of the Birch and the red berries of the Holly, a place where the birds twitter their appreciation of the shelter from the cold wind, where the warmth and glow of the sun is reflected and where the environment is happy and cheerful when the days are dull and depressing. You admire the beauty of the Pines. Possibly you are not acquainted with our big Firs and Spruces. They are real beauties. When nature has wrought her worst havoc with snow and sleet, their beauty is only intensified as they bend fantastically under their icy load and glisten with crystal drapery. Come and study them. You will enthuse over their rare beauty and be glad to add it to your landscape. While you are here we will show you many rare plants that you can weave in. Then there are the brilliant-berried shrubs, as Black Alder, High-bush Cranberry, and Barberry, and bulbs which are apt to smile anytime during warm spells, as Winter Aconite, Crocus, Snowdrop, Adonis, Narcissus, and Hellebore. Why not arrange for a Winter garden? We shall be glad to go into details with you or your landscape architect. We guarantee rare beauty during a period that is otherwise desolate. Write us today, or 'phone or visit us tomorrow.

Vanity Fair Pettibocker

THE Vanity Fair Pettibocker has broken the shackles of feminine attire! Today when Fifth Avenue breezes blow you think you see a silken bit of underskirt—but you don't! It's just her Pettibocker frill.

The Pettibocker—you've guessed it—is a combination petticoat and knicker. There's all the feminine frilliness of one—all the comfort of the other.

In pink and white for evening wear—in grey, taupe, brown, sand, navy, green, gold, purple or black and other street shades.

Your favorite shop doubtless has the Pettibocker and the other Vanity Fair Undersilks. Write for catalog—it tells about the Plus-Four-Inch Vest, the Sure-Lap Union, the full-cut knickers and other smart styles.

Blackheads

that you are using the wrong method of cleansing for your type of skin.

The following famous Woodbury treatment will keep your skin free from this disfiguring trouble.

Apply hot cloths to the face until the skin is reddened. Then with a rough washcloth work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and rub it into the pores thoroughly—always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with clear hot water. Then with cold—the colder the better. If possible, rub your face for a few minutes with a lump of ice. Dry the skin carefully.

Do not expect to get the desired results by using this treatment for a time and then neglecting it. But make it a daily habit and it will give you the clear, attractive skin that the steady use of Woodbury's always brings.

To remove blackheads already formed, substitute a flesh brush for the washcloth in the treatment above. Then, protect the fingers with a handkerchief and press out the blackheads. Thereafter use the above Woodbury treatment in your daily toilet.

A 25c cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap is sufficient for a month or six weeks of this treatment. Get a cake today. It is for sale by dealers everywhere throughout the United States and Canada.

Write today for a week's size cake

For 4c we will send you a sample cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap large enough to last for a week of any Woodbury treatment, together with the booklet, "A skin you love to touch," which gives a list of skin troubles and the treatment suited to each. Send today to The Andrew Jergens Co., 5,114 Spring Grove Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio.

If you live in Canada address The Andrew Jergens Co., Ltd., 5,114 Sherbrooke Street, Perth, Ontario.

"See how wonderful Vanishing Cream has made my skin look—so soft and pink and velvety—and it will stay so all evening, too."

"Until I used Pond's Cold Cream I did not know how purifying, how refreshing a cleansing cream could be."

Every woman needs these two

Learn why every normal skin needs two creams

TO give your complexion the care it needs, two creams are necessary. For cleansing and massage, a cold cream (oil cream) should be used. To protect the skin and keep it soft and pliant, a greaseless cream should be used.

For cleansing and massage

No matter how sensitive the grit and grime of dust have made your skin, with Pond's Cold Cream you can thoroughly cleanse it of all impurities without creating the least irritation. Also for massage, where smooth consistency is so important, Pond's Cold Cream was especially formulated.

When your skin needs Vanishing Cream

To keep the skin soft and pliable even through the harshest, wintriest weather, use Pond's Vanishing Cream. It is a greaseless cream; contains no oil, and the moment you apply it, the skin absorbs it entirely, leaving not the slightest trace of shine.

Pond's Vanishing Cream contains an ingredient which has a peculiar affinity for the skin—an ingredient which physicians have long recognized as one of the utmost value in the care of the skin.

People with oily skins should use only Vanishing Cream

The famous skin specialist, William Allen Pusey, A. M., M. D., says that persons with coarse pores and large fat glands should avoid fatty toilet preparations. Pond's Vanishing Cream is just what the oily skin needs. Having no oil in it, it can add none to your skin. It vanishes at once—does not fill up the already distended pores.

Be guided by these beautiful women

Pond's Vanishing Cream is used by every one of these famous actresses—Frances Starr, Jane Cowl, Constance Collier, Elsie Ferguson, Phyllis Neilson-Terry, Pavlowa, Pauline Frederick, Martha Hedman, Billie Burke, Marion Davies, Norma Talmadge, and countless others.

Neither Pond's Cold Cream nor Pond's Vanishing Cream will cause the growth of hair.

On sale in all drug stores and department stores. Get a tube or jar of each cream today and see how quickly their use will improve your skin.

Send for free samples

If you would like to try Pond's Cold Cream and Pond's Vanishing Cream, fill out the coupon now and we will send you samples of each cream free. Or send 4c for enough of each cream to last two weeks—8c if you wish both. Write today. Address Pond's Extract Co., 153 Hudson Street, New York.

As smart as a French gown

THE influence of Paris is as noticeable in Kayser Italian Silk Underwear as it is in a Paquin gown.

Kayser's get fashion prophesy first hand. Kayser's maintain their own representative in Paris, who sends their designers in New York the news of tomorrow in the fashion world. This makes it possible for Kayser's to bring out the first undergarment to meet a change in style.

One of Kayser's latest creations is the Opera Top. This is a patented top combining vest and bodice; by slipping the shoulder straps under the arms and drawing them in, you can quickly change the top from a regular vest to a bodice for evening wear. The illustration shows you the convenience of this new garment.

Ask for it by name: Kayser Italian Silk Opera Top. Patented Jan. 30, 1917.

Look for the label

tasist on seeing the label on every piece of silk underwear you purchase: The genuine Italian Silk Underwear bears a label in every garment plainly marked "Kayser Italian Silk." One blue star on the label indicates the lighter weight silk—three stars the heavier weight.

utility of the Daybed—a living-room couch during the day, a comfortable bed at night—has won for it an extraordinary popularity. It gives you an extra guest-room whenever you need it. It solves the problem of furnishing a bedroom which must serve also as a reception room, study room, den, or play room. Hitherto, however, the Daybed has been limited in its serviceability to that of a single bed. The Stickley Extension Daybed (entirely original and different from any other) is convertible into a full-size double-bed. There is no clumsy mechanism:—a single pull with one hand, and the simple adjustment of the level of the mattress,—and the day couch becomes a complete comfortable bed that will please the most exacting guest. Made in a wide range of designs, Craftsman, Colonial, and period, and in various pleasing finishes. No matter which style you choose, and regardless of the price, every Stickley Daybed embodies the superb craftsmanship, heirloom permanence, and glowing Chromewald finish which have made the name of Stickley a magic word with lovers of good furniture. It Is Moisture That Spoils Food!

Beware of wet bottles and dishes, dripping fruit and soggy food in your refrigerator!

That soggy, smudgy dampness you may have noticed on fruit, bottles, etc., in your refrigerator is laden with impurities and germs from the air and the melting ice. To prove this: just wipe off a bottle with a clean cloth. This smudge settles on the open food as willingly as upon the bottles, and it is this impure moisture that spoils the food.

You can strike a phosphorus match on the inside of the ice chamber in a

U. S. NOT YET AWAKE

Frank A. Vanderlip Says Bluntly That "Business as Usual" and "Pleasure as Usual" Must Stop if We Are to Win War

By GEORGE MacADAM.

A DEMOCRACY is an inefficient machine; an ably directed autocracy is a highly efficient one. It is a grave question if the full strength of a democracy can be directed to the achievement of a single purpose, a grave question if the interests of the individual can be subordinated to the interests of the nation. To put in the vernacular what is now the vital problem of civilization: Has democratic America, considering its size and sinews, the war punch that autocratic Germany has? And the answer at the present time is an emphatic 'No.'"

To Frank A. Vanderlip had been put the question: Should the Government conscript every worker in the United States, calling him to the industrial colors as the need arises? With the world conflict resolving itself largely into a question of food and coal and munitions; with the Allies who for three years have withstood the bloody brunt of battle turning to unscratched America for these necessities of life and battle; with strikes increasing here at an alarming rate, (hundreds of them since the United States entered the war;) with reports numerous that American labor radicals were trying to overawe the conservatives; with the conscription of the railroads and big business an accomplished fact—with all these things in mind, it seems a timely question whether or not the worker alone should be allowed the privilege of playing the part of the self-seeking slacker.

"Now it may be," said Mr. Vanderlip, "that the near future will show that democracy can stand the acid test that it is now being put to; it may be that the fact that the world must be saved from the Teutonic Hun and all that he stands for will get into the souls of the American people deep enough for them to forget for the time being their individual interests and bring them together as an efficient nation working toward a single end.

"But we are a long way from that yet. The mechanic is thinking of his wage advantage, the manufacturer of his profits, the newspaper of its advertising, Wall Street of its stock prices. In the face of this world crisis, 'Business as usual' is the watchword of the man at work, and 'Pleasure as usual' is his practice when at leisure. It is undeniable that, as a nation, democratic America is not yet ready to meet this supreme test of a people—can each individual forget himself and work for the good of all?'

"But no one would deny that Germany, by one means or another, has been brought to this condition of efficiency. Though there is a practically news-proof curtain over Germany, though we have little authentic news of what is happening there, we can tell by the battering-ram thrusts that come from behind that curtain—now into Serbia, now into Russia, into Rumania, into Italy—that Germany is a nation completely organized for war.

"There is no 'Business as usual' nor 'Pleasure as usual' there, no wasted effort in luxury making, no lost motion in munition strikes. Germany is a machine thoroughly co-ordinated for the making of war, a machine whose sole purpose is scientific destruction.

"This war isn't tiddle-de-winks, and we're going to find it out. The present smashing inroad into Italy has proved a partial eye-opener to us Americans. It is giving us some measure of the giant strength of our adversary. But we are not yet awake to the fact that if we are going to play our part in winning this war—a part that is going to grow bigger and bigger—we have got to muster our full fighting strength as a nation.

"This war is being fought as much in the machine shops and munition factories, in coal mines and wheat fields, on railroads and cargo ships, as it is on the actual field of battle. Nothing is surer than that America must be completely organized for war. This has been said thousands and thousands of times. But we haven't done it yet.

"The Government has a magnificently patriotic program: it is going to spend nineteen billions of dollars during the present year. But are we going to make it possible for the Government to spend this money, for it to go into the market and buy what it needs?

"At the present time the answer of the American people is 'No'; they insist upon 'Business as usual' and 'Pleasure as usual'; they insist upon entering the labor market in competition with the Government, and by making heavy demands upon the man power of the country seriously crippling the war effort that the nation ought to be able to make.

"I believe that this answer is being given without a full realization of what it means; but that in no wise minimizes its effect. This 'No' stands as a great obstacle in the way of the Government getting what it needs. And unless the Government gets what it needs, it is going to make a failure of this war. That is the hard, cold truth, and there is no use trying to dodge it.

"Here are the facts:

"There is only so much man power in the country, a man power that, contrasted with normal times, has been greatly depleted by the drafting into the army of much of its most virile force.

"The people who insist upon 'Business as usual' and 'Pleasure as usual' are demanding from this depleted man-power the same production of goods that an undepleted man power was kept busy producing in normal times

"Now comes the Government with a demand upon this overworked, depleted man power for the production in one year of nineteen billion dollars of additional goods!

"It is almost impossible to grasp the colossal proportions of the expenditure by the Government in one year of $19,000,000,000. This comparison helps: Since the American Nation was founded in 1791 its total expenditure for all purposes, down to the beginning of the present year—civil war and everything else included—was $26,300,000,000. Now in one year it has planned to spend $19,000,000,000, or only $7,300,000,000 less than it spent in its previous 126 years of existence.

"The conclusion is obvious. The manpower of the nation is totally unable to meet the double demand that is being made upon it; some one must be left unsatisfied. The question that we Americans must answer is this: Is the unsatisfied bidder in the labor market to be the Government or the individual? Is the Government to get what it needs for war, or is the individual to continue to get what he got in normal times?

"To call on the depleted man-power of the country to give us those things that we must have to maintain life and efficiency, and on top of that to produce nineteen billions of goods in a single year for the Government, is to call it to a staggering task. Perhaps it can answer the call, but only if the people will cease demanding those things that they absolutely do not need.

"And then you have the trouble with the labor situation: we are asking labor to do more than it can do—there isn't enough to go around.

"Now you ask: Shall we conscript labor?

"That is a hard thing to do. Before we resort to any such drastic methods in this country, we should first make a big effort to get people to release labor. The lesson must be brought home to every one that if a dollar is spent for any luxury, for any unnecessary thing, for anything that can possibly be done without, that dollar has been put into competition with the Government's dollar; if the Government's dollar is outbid, just so much man power has been taken from the war effort that the nation can make.

"The rule holds good all along the line, from millionaire to laborer.

"Congress can appropriate money, but that doesn't fight the war. The Treasury Department can float bonds; neither does that fight the war. Appropriations and bonds are worthless unless they can buy and deliver munitions to the fighting forces. It is simply a matter of what can be delivered on the battle field.

"Let me state the thing concretely: If there is a man working at a lathe making a shell, a shell that will be needed by our men fighting to beat, perhaps to hold back, the Hun, and you outbid the Government and hire that man away, let us say to build a pleasure automobile or a piano or some other unnecessary thing, it is clear that you have been unpatriotic, that you have been grossly selfish, that you have set your pleasure above some one else's life.

"Do you remember that picture, 'His Last Shot'?—a single soldier in a hastily dug trench, surrounded by the enemy, wounded, game, but brought to the end of his fight because he was down to his last cartridge. We should all of us keep that picture in mind when we are spending money; if we take man power from the Government's munition factories, some of our boys out on the fighting line may be put in that same tragic position.

"The enemy will try to make raids on the supply trains of our army. That's war. But each of us here at home ought to realize that when he buys an unnecessary thing, he, too, is raiding the supply trains of our army.

"Now, when you urge against 'business as usual' and 'pleasure as usual,' there are a lot of people who say: 'But you're going to throw a lot of people out of employment; you're going to disorganize industry; you're going to destroy business. Even judging the matter from the standpoint of the needs of the Government, there must be a background of good business to float loans on.'

"It's true that there will be a certain amount of all this in a nation that is suddenly making the transition from one that is pursuing 'business and pleasure as usual' to one that has industrially organized itself into a machine for war.

"But no one will go into unemployment. He will only go into another employment. There may be some personal inconvenience in making the change; but it will only be a question of the worker finding his place in the new order.

"We must have the necessities of life, and to supply this great nation with those is a big task in itself. And on top of this, we're planning to spend $19,000,000,000 during this single year for purposes of war. All this means that we're going to have the most intense activity possible, that we're going to have the greatest demand for labor in the history of this country."

"How about the employer and the landlord?" I asked.

"The employer who deals in things that are not necessities of life, the man who owns property where these things are made or sold, must endeavor to adjust his business or his property to the changed order. The manufacture and handling of $19,000,000,000 worth of munitions means a great demand for factories and other buildings. Many factories, both big and little, that until recently were turning out the luxuries of life, are now busy making war materials."

"And those that cannot fit into the changed order?"

"Must put up their shutters," answered Mr. Vanderlip. "War means sacrifice."

"But how about the man who isn't even asked to sacrifice, the man who, already paid good wages, tries to take advantage of the urgencies of the nation and strikes for 'all the traffic will bear'? In this time of crisis, shouldn't such a man be conscripted to do such work as the nation needs him to do?"

"The Government might find a 'job for the agitator. I am heartily in favor of such a form of conscription, and I do not think we can adopt it too soon. But when it comes to conscripting industry, how can you conscript the miner and make him mine or the laborer and make him labor? In this country at the present time the only way we can efficiently conscript the self-seeking striker is by the force of public opinion. In a democracy it is the only force that should be necessary.

"But when we talk of conscripting labor, by whatever means, let us remember that there is a good deal of weight to the demand for higher wages. It would be manifestly unfair to conscript labor and pay it a wage that it cannot live on. We have already conscripted the railroads, and are paying them a rate that they cannot live on. The inevitable result is already apparent—they are inefficient, rendering unsatisfactory service to both Government and public. Pay labor an insufficient rate, and we'll have the same result.

"The high cost of living, plus a demand for labor in excess of anything possible to supply, makes for higher wages, and, to a reasonable extent, ought to, from the point of view of the workman.

"But if you look for the real remedy for the demand for excessive wages, we get back exactly where we started from—reduce the excessive demand for labor.

"Here is the present crisis in a nutshell: Either we stand by our luxuries or we stand by the Government."

VENICE WITH ENEMY AT HER GATES

Art Treasures of Italy's Most Beautiful City, Even Wall Paintings, Probably Have Been Removed to Safety

"I THINK," said Edwin Blashfield, the painter, when the Italians were first reported to be in retreat at the Piave, "that hundreds of thousands of Americans must be talking of Venice tonight."

Venice contains some of the world's most marvelous treasures. But to Americans—artists and travelers and thousands of people who have only read and dreamed of Venice—the unique loveliness of the storied city is the most marvelous treasure of all. Venice herself, from her Piazza, that is like nothing else in the world, to her Tiepolo frescoes, that could only go down in the city's destruction, is one of the rare jewels of the world. There is nothing even to resemble the strange loveliness of the architecture of this frail-set old city rising like a dream from the sea.

Yet to many Americans who do not realize that wall paintings are not necessarily frescoes, it will come as a grateful surprise to learn that nearly all the paintings in Venice are probably movable. That cannot be stated definitely, because, as Mr. Blashfield pointed out, some of the canvases, such as the Veronese ceilings in the Ducal Palace, may have been glued fast in years gone by. But with the exception of the Tiepolo frescoes, the greatest paintings of Venice were done on canvas, not on ceiling or wall. And many of them are known to be on stretchers, and movable. They, like the other movable art treasures, probably were taken away from the menaced city many days ago.

"Some of the most famous Tiepolo frescoes are in the Palazzo Labia," said Mr. Blashfield. "Two of the greatest are the banquet and the deportation scenes in the episode of Antony and Cleopatra. There is a very splendid one in the Church of the Pietà on the Riva degli Schiavoni, and there is a fine oil painting in the School of the Carmine. One of the frescoes, in the Church of the Scalzi, has already been destroyed by Austrian bombs."

Two other beautiful Tiepolo paintings are the "Virgin Enthroned, with Saints," in the Church of the Gesuati, and "Christ Bearing His Cross," in the Church of St. Alvise. One of his finest ceiling paintings is in the Academy, and he has another famous fresco in the Palazzo Rezzonico.

The greatest masterpiece of painting in Venice is Titian's "Assumption of the Virgin," in the Academy. With the "Assumption," this premier of the Venetian painters entered upon a new phase of his own development; gave, more specifically than he ever had before, a new and definite character to the art of Venice, and produced what some critics have said to be the most wonderful picture in the world. Yet it is interesting to note that the clergy and congregation of the Frari, the church for which he made the vast painting as an altar piece, were far from pleased with his work!

After the "Assumption," the most famous Titian in Venice is the Madonna of the Pesaro family in the Church of the Frari. A popular and beautiful Titian is the "Presentation in the Temple," painted in 1538 for the "Sala dell' Albergo" of the Brotherhood "della Carita," and housed now in that same room, long since become "Room XX." of the "Accademia dei Belli Arti" of Venice. The beauty of the individual figures has made this painting a favorite with the public, while the lifelike grouping has been especially admired. "St. John the Baptist in the Wilderness" is in the same gallery, as is the master's last painting, a "Pietà," on which he was engaged at the time of his death, when he was in his 99th year, and which was completed by Palma Giovane. A famous Titian in the Ducal Palace is the "Doge Antonio Grimani Kneeling Before Religion." In the Church of Santa Maria della Salute is an altar piece, "St. Mark and Four Other Saints," as well as an injured painting, the "Descent of the Holy Ghost," and in the Church of San Sebastiano is a "St. Nicholas" by Titian. The high altar piece in the Church of San Salvatore, a "Transfiguration," is also injured, but the "Annunciation," in the same church, is intact. There are two Titians in the school of San Rocco.

Titian's Masterpiece, "The Assumption of the Virgin," Venice's Chief Art Treasure, Regarded As One of the World's Greatest Paintings.

The greatest of the great Venetians is less richly represented, in point of numbers, than some of the other famous painters—Veronese, Tintoretto, the Bellini. Some of the wall and ceiling paintings which many Americans will perhaps be surprised to be reminded are movable, and which are among the famous paintings of the world, are those of Veronese and Tintoretto in the Ducal Palace. Mr. Blashfield, who lived in Venice for years, called special attention to the four Tintorettos in the Anticollegio—the "Forge of Vulcan," "Mercury with the Graces," "Minerva Driving Back Mars," and "Ariadne and Bacchus"—and to those in the Sala de Collegio itself—the "Doge Andrea Gritti Praying to the Virgin," "Nuptials of St. Catharine," "Virgin in Glory," and "Adoration of the Savior." Other beautiful painting by Tintoretto in the Ducal Palace are the "Descent from the Cross" and "Doge Pietro Loredan Imploring the Aid of the Virgin," in the Sala del Senato, and the "Doge Niccolo da Ponte in the Presence of Venice," one of the best of the ceiling paintings in the Hall of the Great Council. That hall also contains Tintoretto's "Paradise," the largest oil painting in the world, l more notable for its size, among so many beautiful pictures, than for its beauty; in fact, the general effect of the crowds of figures on the great canvas is one of bewilderment. There is scarcely a room in the Ducal Palace in the decoration of which Jacopo Tintoretto did not have a hand.

But Tintoretto's great work in Venice is the "Miracle of St. Mark" in the Academy. Of this and some of his other paintings, as well as of the general characteristics of the man and his art, Corrado Ricci says:

> Vasari's description of Tintoretto is very apposite when he says "that his was the most terrific brain that had ever occupied itself with painting * * * that he was extravagant, capricious, rapid, and resolute," and he continues: "He has sometimes in place of finished pictures left us sketches dashed in with such energy that the strokes of the brush appear to be the result of accident or of rage rather than of design or of judgment.

The two great colorists, Tintoretto and Paolo Veronese, who have given to Venice so much of the work that is most famous there now, are commonly named together. By way of comparison, Ricci, beginning with the statement that among the artists who followed Titian these two "towered above the rest by virtue of their productivity, their wealth of invention, and their rapidity of execution," writes:

> To the dramatic violence of his contemporary Tintoretto, Paolo opposed the seduction of an art that was eminently calm, serene, and magnificent. For this reason it

REMEDY FOR INFANTILE PARALYSIS

Dr. Edward C. Rosenow of the Mayo Clinic Tried His Serum on Children with Brilliant Results During Epidemic in Davenport, Iowa

By MARY B. MULLETT.

EVERY father and mother in the country will feel a throb of relief and of hope over what has just happened at Davenport, Iowa. An epidemic of infantile paralysis in that city has ended with a banquet and an ovation.

To talk of relief, hope, banquets, and ovations in connection with a disease which has terrified the country is startling; but there is good reason for it. The relief and hope are because a new remedy for the disease was tried out with wonderful results. The banquet and the ovation were given to the man who developed the remedy—Dr. Edward C. Rosenow of the Mayo Clinic at Rochester, Minn. I was present at the staff meeting there when he gave his report on the experiment. By way of beginning he said with a smile:

"I didn't pray last Summer for an epidemic of poliomyelitis! But I did pray that if there should be one I would have a chance to try the new serum. So when a telegram reached me asking me to come to Davenport at once I started immediately. Forty-eight hours later I began the first test of the remedy ever made on a human being."

Dr. Rosenow then went on to tell of his six weeks' work; of case after case in which a single injection of the serum was followed by a complete checking of the disease; of children whose temperature fell in a few hours from 103 degrees to normal—and stayed there; of rapidly progressing paralysis which was arrested as if by magic.

The story is one the world will want to read. But to tell it properly one must go back a little. It may be remembered that several years ago Flexner and Noguchi, working at the Rockefeller Institute in New York, discovered what they believed was the cause of poliomyelitis—as the doctors prefer to call infantile paralysis. They thought they had found it to be a filterable ultra microscopic virus. That is, it was an organism so small that it could not be caught by a filter and could not be detected under the microscope.

They believed this to be true because when the blood from a patient had been passed through a filter which eliminated all the bacteria which could be caught that way, they were still able to produce the disease by inoculating animals with the fluid which had been filtered. This seemed to be conclusive evidence that the germ which caused the trouble was so minute as to defy detection.

In the course of their experiments they did find a microbe, a pleomorphic streptococcus, which was always present. Naturally suspicion fell on this microbe. But as they were still able to produce the disease with the fluid from which all trace of the streptococcus had been filtered out, they concluded that it was merely a contamination, not the cause.

It is at this point that Dr. Rosenow's discovery comes in. Some years ago he demonstrated that certain organisms, under certain conditions, were so minute as to be invisible and would pass through a filter; but also that these same invisible germs, under other conditions, grew to a size where they were visible and could be caught by a filter.

He went to work on the theory that this particular streptococcus was one of those germs, and he proved this to be true. Having demonstrated this, it was easy to show that the pleomorphic streptococcus was the cause of infantile paralysis. Having proved this, he set to work to develop a serum which could be employed in treating the disease. This serum he finally obtained from a horse, and he used it in experiments on monkeys and other small animals. But it remained to be shown what its effect would be on human beings.

Hence his Summer supplications for a chance to try it out and his eager response to the call from Davenport. I went to that city to get the story of the experiment from Dr. W. H. Rendleman, who was the consulting physician during the epidemic.

"The first I knew of the presence of poliomyelitis here," said Dr. Rendleman, "was when one of my own patients called me up to say that a neighbor's child had the disease. I at once verified the report. Then I wired Dr. Rosenow. He and I are old friends, and I knew about the serum he had been working on.

"He reached here the next evening, and we went to see his first patient, a 6-year-old boy named Harold Mohl. This was thirty-six hours after the case had been diagnosed. The child had a temperature of 102 degrees, and was partially paralyzed. The left face, arm, and leg were affected. The right side seemed to be free. Before the serum could be used it had to be activated by adding fresh guinea pig serum, and as this could not be done that night at the laboratory here, it was not until the next morning that the experiment on the boy could be made. That was forty-eight hours after the beginning of the attack. By that time the paralysis was developing in the right leg also.

"We explained to the boy's parents that the serum had never been tested on a human being, and that we could not predict definitely what the effect would be. But Dr. Rosenow told them of his experiments on monkeys, of his belief that it would benefit the child, and we asked if they consented to its use. There was no alternative treatment that promised anything, so they said they were willing to have it tried. They are pretty proud now to be able to say that their boy was the first human subject on which the serum was used.

"After it has been activated the serum is diluted with equal parts of a salt solution before being injected. Dr. Rosenow first makes a spinal puncture and draws a small amount of the spinal fluid. This is partly to relieve the intraspinal pressure and partly for making a test to confirm the diagnosis of the disease.

"This spinal fluid is made to escape slowly, as he believes its rapid withdrawal is harmful. He then makes the cell count and the Noguchi globulin test immediately. Even though there may be no doubt in the physician's mind as to its being a true case of poliomyelitis, this test is advisable as confirming the diagnosis.

"In the case of the Mohl boy the test was positive; so it was followed at once by an injection of the serum. As it was the first experiment on a human being, Dr. Rosenow began with a dose which he later decided was too small—three cubic centimeters of the serum. That meant six cubic centimeters of the diluted mixture. The child's temperature fell; but later rose again, and a second injection was given. Following that, the temperature dropped to normal, and there was no extension of the paralysis. The boy recovered and is getting along well.

"There are certain points which must be explained to lay readers. In poliomyelitis the paralysis is due to the destruction of cells at the roots of the nerves by the invading organism—the microbe. There may be a good many of these cells supplying, for instance, the arm. If they are all destroyed the arm is totally paralyzed. If only some of them are destroyed the arm is partially paralyzed.

Edith M. Benson, Another Child Who Recovered Completely Under the Serum Treatment.

Nature gives us a surplus to provide for just such an emergency.

"When some of these cells are destroyed Nature helps those that are left to buck up and do their job by themselves. Hence the slow improvement which follows poliomyelitis when there has been only partial paralysis. But when cells are dead—they are dead for keeps.

"The Rosenow serum—and any other agency we know of—cannot rebuild destroyed cells. What the serum does accomplish is to kill the invading organism so that the work of destruction is stopped. In our experience here it did this almost without exception. Where paralysis had begun it was stopped. When the serum was used early in the attack, before any cells were destroyed, there was no paralysis at all! For instance, let me tell you of the last case we treated.

"This was another 6-year-old child; a little girl named Edith Benson. I first saw her about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. She had a temperature of 103 degrees, tremors, the bowels were involved, and the neck was weak. Dr. Rosenow had been called to a patient out in the country, and it was 7 o'clock that evening before he could reach this little girl.

"We knew the case was poliomyelitis. But for scientific purposes he made the necessary tests to confirm the diagnosis. Then he gave an injection of the serum—a larger one than he had given in the initial experiment, as he had learned by this time more about the proper dosage. The child began to improve immediately. Her temperature soon fell to normal. The other symptoms abated, and within a few days she was perfectly well, running around and playing as usual. She is all right now. And there has not been at any time any indication of paralysis.

"I said she began to improve immediately. That is the exact truth. The serum is injected very slowly; at the rate of about 2 c. c. a minute. To babies is given from 6 to 14 c. c. of the diluted mixture; to children from two to five years of age, from 14 to 20 c. c.; and to older persons, from 20 to 40 c. c. This means that, if a 5-year-old child received 20 c. c., the injection would take 10 minutes.

"Over and over in our experience here we were astonished to find that even during the giving of the injection the patient would begin to improve, so prompt and so decisive was the action of the serum. It is injected, by the way, into one of the superficial veins.

"Now about the cases where there was failure to check the disease: The epidemics this year, not only in Davenport, but in other places as well, have been marked by an unusually high death rate. Ordinarily the mortality in poliomyelitis is rather slow; under 10 per cent. This year it has been from 35 to 50 per cent. Some physicians have reported an even higher rate.

"One reason for the increased mortality this year has been the fact that the disease has been accompanied frequently by respiratory paralysis. If a patient has a paralyzed arm or leg he can recover. But if he cannot breathe, he dies. A certain number of the patients here on whom the serum was used had this respiratory paralysis already. They were dying when it was given. But as the whole thing was experimental the serum was injected in every case that was presented—especially as the parents would not have forgiven us if we had failed to do so.

"You can imagine the intense interest here in the trial of the remedy. Its power was being demonstrated daily in other cases, and we should have been almost mobbed if we had refused to try it on a patient, even though we knew that patient to be beyond any help. So these hopeless cases are included in the report, although to do so is not really fair to the serum.

"I have the figures of Dr. Rosenow's preliminary report. They cover forty-four treated cases in this city and neighborhood. Of these nine died, a mortality of about 20 per cent. Six of these nine fatal cases were the hopeless ones of which I have spoken. They were dying of respiratory paralysis when the serum was given. They should not be included in the record.

"Leaving them out, the mortality was three cases out of thirty-eight, a mortality of only about 8 per cent. Of these three cases one was a baby 11 months old, semi-comatose from spasms eight days after the attack began. It was practically hopeless. The other was a 2-year-old child with cyanosis, marked tremors, high fever, severe gastro-enteritis, and beginning respiratory paralysis. The chance of recovery was almost negligible.

"This leaves a single case out of the

No Grounds for Plebiscite in Alsace-Lorraine

France's Clear Title Upheld and Germany's Claims Punctured by Professor Charles D. Hazen of Columbia

THERE must be no such nonsense as a plebiscite or referendum when the time comes to give Alsace-Lorraine back to France, says Charles Downer Hazen, Professor of History at Columbia, and who as a member of the National Board of History Service is working for this country and the Allies on the main business of winning the war.

Article One of the Treaty of Frankfort of May 10, 1871, read as follows: "France renounces, in favor of the German Empire, all rights and titles to the territories situated east of the boundaries designated below. The German Empire shall possess these territories forever in full sovereignty and ownership." The territories, of course, were Alsace-Lorraine.

"And now," says Dr. Hazen in a new book on the disposition, when peace is made, of the stolen provinces, "the first article in the territorial readjustment should be one restoring Belgium to the Belgians, and restoring to France her lost provinces, those lost in 1870 as well as those lost in 1914."

An extended article written by Dr. Hazen for THE NEW YORK TIMES last July showed more clearly than it ever had been done before the hollowness of the claim that the German Government is a Government for the benefit of the German people. It was reprinted by the United States Government in pamphlet form and sent broadcast over the country through the Committee on Public Information as a bit of education in modern European history much needed by the American people.

In his new book, published by Henry Holt & Co., Dr. Hazen has completely exploded another myth which Germany's rulers have tried hard to get the world to accept—that Germany was only taking back what rightfully belonged to her when she annexed Alsace and Lorraine as a part of her loot won in the Franco-Prussian war. To quote from the book:

> No honest man believes that because Germany has controlled a tenth of France for the past three years she has the slightest right to that territory or ever will have or ever could have. If she should keep her grip upon them for forty years and more, as she has kept it upon Alsace-Lorraine, she would have no greater right than on the very first day of her unspeakable aggression. There is no more a question of Alsace-Lorraine today, after forty-six years of occupation, than there is of the Department of the North after three years of occupation.
> If the German annexations of 1870 are justified, then the actual annexations of the present war are justified. The two cases stand upon an absolute parity. The people of Alsace-Lorraine have never admitted the right, they have only admitted the fact, of German rule, as no doubt the peasants of Northern France have done and are perforce doing at the present moment.
> Ought there to be a referendum? No one would think of demanding that a popular vote should be taken in the Department of the North, for instance, to see if it should become French again. There is no more reason for consulting Alsace-Lorraine, taken forty-six years ago by precisely the same methods.
> If the proposition had actually been realized, made in 1917 by the German Foreign Secretary to the Mexican Government that, for services to be rendered to Germany by Mexico and Japan by their waging war upon the United States, Mexico should be rewarded by the acquisition of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona, does any sane person believe that the people of the United States or the people of the States concerned would, after forty years, have consented to submit the question of their return to the United States to a popular vote, conducted by the Mexican Government?
> The practical difficulties in the way of a referendum arise from the initial act of violence. Who would be the citizens of Alsace-Lorraine entitled to vote and to decide by their vote the fate of the provinces? Should they be only the present residents? But over 400,000 Alsatians and Lorrainers have, owing to the annexation, left their native country without hope of return, and have kept their love of it undimmed in the bitterness of exile, of poignant separation from friends and relatives. Are they and their sons who have paid this heavy price for their fidelity to the fundamental principle in which every true American believes and must believe because it is the very cornerstone of our national independence and freedom, are these people to have nothing to say at the time when the reunion of their provinces with France is among the possibilities, and are the Germanizing agents and immigrants in Alsace to have the vote in such a plebiscite? Again, who would conduct the referendum? In view of the ruthless régime of murder, imprisonment, espionage, and delation which Germany installed in the provinces in August, 1914, would a referendum conducted under German authority be apt to be honest and scrupulous?
> This issue does not admit of compromise. It must be kept as clear cut as it is in its essential nature. The principle at the basis of the Treaty of Frankfort must be repudiated and emphatically discredited by its complete and resounding reversal. Never at any time has Alsace-Lorraine admitted that it was German. It declared the Treaty of Frankfort null and void, and it has never rescinded that declaration.
> The character of the German Government for forty-six years, the very provisions of German legislation during all those years, the measures of the German administration, the occasional admissions of German officials as to the real situation, all show that the official affirmation that Alsace-Lorraine has become thoroughly German has not been believed even in the official circles which have made the affirmation. Their conduct has belied their words. Has German policy in Alsace-Lorraine at any time since 1871 been based upon the theory that a people who admittedly were opposed to annexation have become reconciled and are loyal Germans? What has Germany done to turn hatred into love, dissatisfaction into contentment? Friedrich Naumann has admitted in his recent book, "Central Europe," that "the modern Germans almost everywhere in the world are unfortunately bad Germanizers." There is no more notorious commonplace in European politics than the egregious failure of the Germans to Germanize or even conciliate. Germany's Polish, Danish, and French subjects are eloquent witnesses to this incapacity. Germany can hold people in subjection; she can not or will not give them freedom.

* * * * * * * *

It has been suggested that Alsace-Lorraine be made an independent and autonomous monarchy with a royal house of its own within the German Empire. It also has been suggested that it be made an independent and naturalized State outside the German Empire as well as outside France. These are but ways of evading the problem, not ways of repairing a grievous wrong which has been and still is a serious public injury, an offense to the world's sense of justice, and a menace to the world's peace. They ignore the rights and wishes of the people concerned. The wrong can be repaired in only one way—by the return of these provinces to France, where they belong and where they desire to be.

Professor Charles Downer Hazen.

In the earlier chapters of his book Dr. Hazen disposes of the vague but more or less prevailing uncertainty in this country as to the original rights of France and Germany in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine. It has been one of the many tasks of the German propagandists in the United States, notably Bernstorff himself, in the last three years to convey the impression that the provinces really belonged to Germany and that she was merely recovering her own property by the annexation of 1870.

There is no well-defined history covering the territory now included in what is known as Alsace-Lorraine previous to the Treaty of Westphalia of 1648, ending the thirty years of the religious wars. Before that the territory, divided into many different petty States of various sorts, was included in the equally vague Holy Roman German Empire, so called. Nothing in history or politics is more absurd than the pretension of modern Germany that she is the same thing as the Holy Roman Empire, (which, as some historian has said, was neither holy nor Roman nor an empire,) and that she has a right to lands that were once loosely held within that empire. But it was on nothing more substantial than that that modern Germany based her claim to Alsace-Lorraine in 1870. The bulk of the territory within the provinces was voluntarily ceded to France in 1648 as a reward for the aid that France had rendered in the religious wars. The rest of it, a comparatively small part, was acquired by various international negotiations and transactions which Dr. Hazen does not pretend to justify. But the outstanding fact, as shown by this book, is that Alsace-Lorraine never belonged to what is Germany now or what was Germany in 1870; that it had belonged absolutely to France for two centuries and a quarter when Germany seized it at the end of the Franco-Prussian war.

In the first century and a half of their history as French provinces Alsace and Lorraine went on very much as they had before so far as thought and custom were concerned. The only change was in the better economic condition which came to them with their freedom from the perpetual little wars that had ravaged them as petty States within the Holy Roman Empire. Being part of France saved them from that and they were grateful. But it was not until 1789 that Alsace and Lorraine were actually reborn into the spirit of France and ceased for all time to be German in the thought or will of their people. The book continues:

> A new and momentous phase of French history began, from which modern France and modern Europe have never been able to shake themselves permanently free. A new society was developed. Modern France, which, despite various vicissitudes, has gone on developing ever since. With this profound and sweeping transformation Alsace and Lorraine were intimately associated at every step. In the tremendous and desperate wars, as in the fierce political and social struggles within, Alsace participated with all her energy and all her soul. There was no holding aloof, no separate or individual action. The fusion was completed in the immense heat of the boiling furnace which we call the French Revolution—service in the revolutionary wars completed the process of assimilation. The sons of Alsace and Lorraine flocked into the volunteer armies of France. On the Arc de Triomphe in Paris are inscribed the names of twenty-eight Alsatian Generals, whose careers and characters were the talk of the Alsatian firesides.
> Fustel de Coulanges, the French historian, wrote to Theodore Mommsen in 1870 a letter from which Dr. Hazen quotes the following: "Do you know what made Alsace French? It was not Louis XIV., it was our revolution of 1789. Since that moment Alsace has followed all our destinies; she has lived our life. All that we think, she thinks; all that we feel, she feels. She has shared our victories and our defeats, our glory and our mistakes, all our joy and all our sorrow."
> The "Marseillaise" was composed in Alsace and there played and sung for the first time. In 1848 Alsace observed with great enthusiasm the two hundredth anniversary of her annexation to France.

In other chapters of his book Dr. Hazen gives many specific instances of the brutality and stupidity with which Germany has ruled Alsace-Lorraine for the last forty-six years, always as conquered territory without the rights or privileges of the other parts of the German Empire.

Remedy for Infantile Paralysis Successfully Tried

forty-four treated which should have responded but failed to do so. Dr. Rosenow felt that this case should have been helped. He could not explain the failure of the serum in this instance.

"By the way, we had several adult patients, all of whom were among those who died from respiratory failure. The oldest among the treated patients who recovered was between 16 and 20 years of age. A letter from Dr. Rosenow since his return to Rochester expresses his conviction that the dose given these adults was not sufficiently large. It must be remembered that the work here was experimental.

"The great and encouraging feature of the Davenport trial is this: In every one of the sixteen cases treated before paralysis occurred, there was complete recovery without any symptoms of paralysis. And in the others that recovered there was no extension of paralysis after the treatment was given. We physicians have learned to be cautious in our conclusions from a single experiment. But there is no doubt in my mind as to the efficacy of the Rosenow serum.

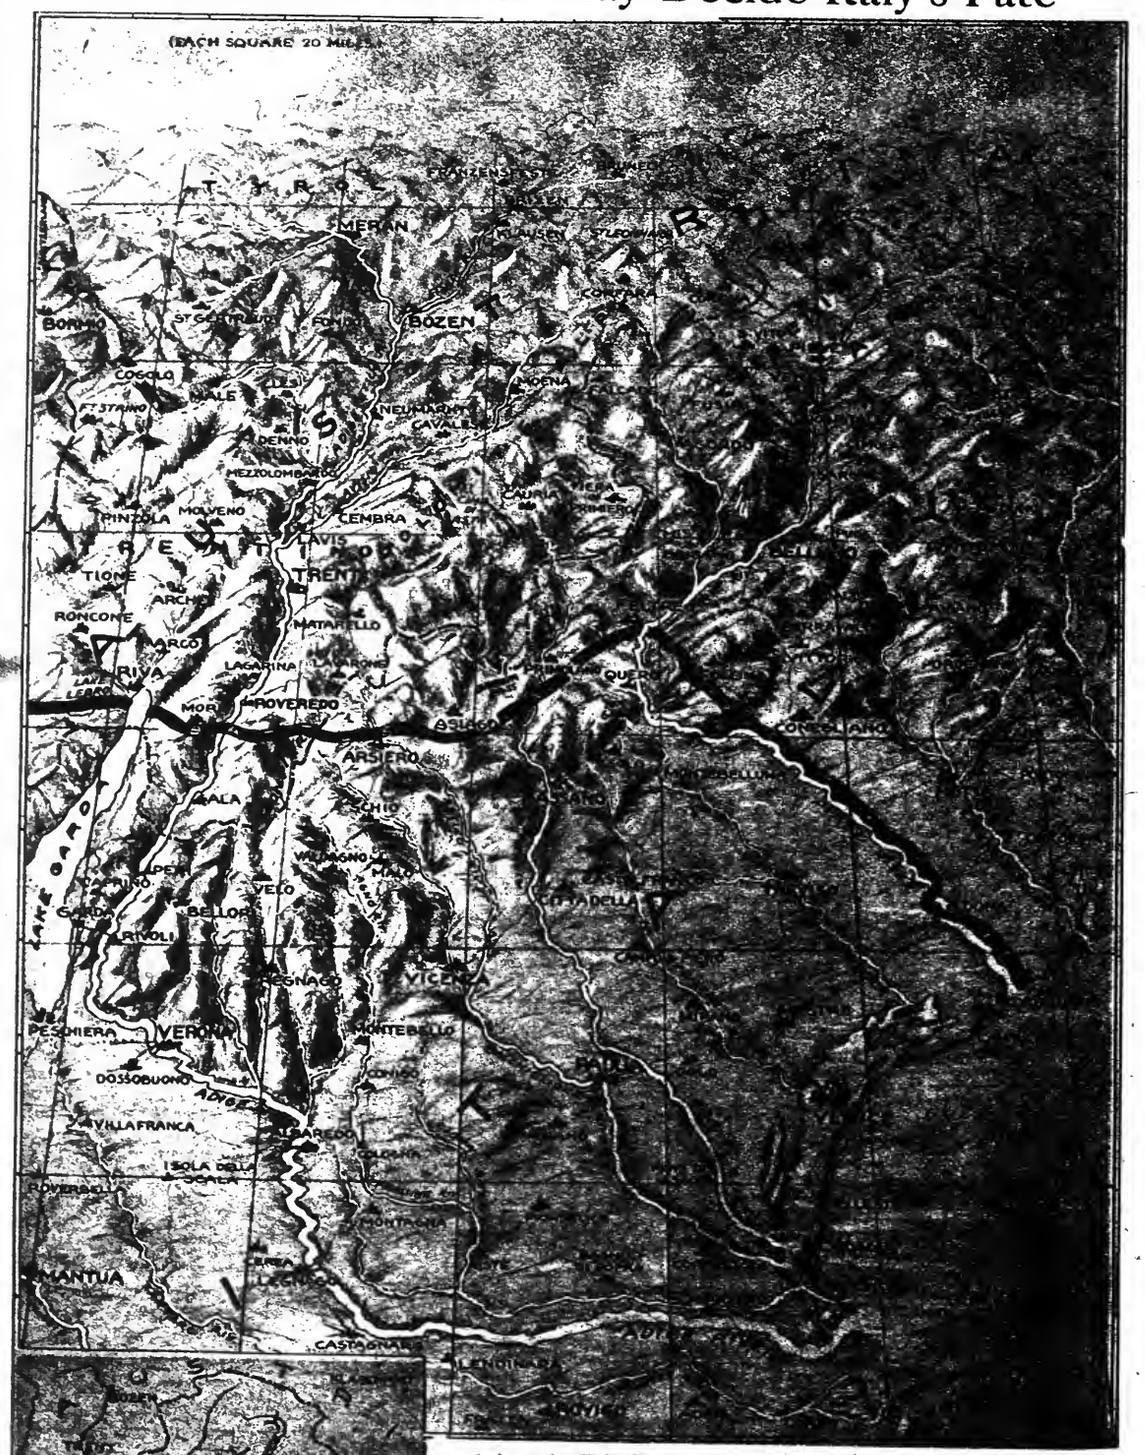
"In some of our cases the results almost surpassed belief. The people of Davenport have shown their gratitude and enthusiasm by inviting Dr. Rosenow, through the Commercial Club, to be their guest at a banquet and to receive an engrossed testimonial expressing their appreciation. I ought to add that he accepted the invitation under protest. It took my best efforts to get him to come and be dined."

I can quite believe this. When I had asked him for a picture of himself to be published, he had politely but firmly refused.

"Oh, wait till I'm dead!" he exclaimed. "Who wants to see my picture? Anyway, this thing is just in its infancy. Many more cases must be treated before we can draw final conclusions. I have on hand enough serum to treat about 800 patients. It will be sent gratis to physicians in communities where poliomyelitis exists in epidemic form.

"We have just sent some to Erie, Penn., to be used in an epidemic. The reports of the cases occurring there before the serum was obtained show a mortality of about 50 per cent. It remains to be seen what the serum will accomplish. The great thing at present is that the Davenport trial seems to prove that the serum has unquestionable value in preventing and in arresting the paralysis if used in time. But, of course, the thing which is of even greater importance is to develop a serum which, by inoculation, shall have power to prevent the disease itself. That is what I am working on now."

Where Great Battle May Decide Italy's Fate



As late as last Wednesday it appeared that the Italian armies, rallying after their retreat from the Isonzo, would make a stand along the lower Piave River and the mountains south of Asiago. Judging from dispatches received from Italy, the Italian battlefront ran along the Piave to a point near Feltre, whence it swung westward to the Trentino mountain positions, continuing thence across the Lake of Garda. The Teutons had forced crossings of the lower Piave, near San Dona di Piave and established a bridgehead on the western bank somewhat to the north of that place.

Should the Piave line be abandoned, Venice will fall to the invaders, together with Treviso and other important cities. The next good lines of defense would be along the Brenta and Adige. The latter is particularly suitable for defense, since the danger from an outflanking operation by the Teutons is far less there than along other rivers.

Problem of Manning the New Merchant Ships

Admiral Fiske Heads Volunteer Organization for Training Young American Sailors—The Government's Efforts Have Lagged

By RICHARD BARRY.

MEN are the measure of the service, not the ships. Such is an axiom of the English merchant marine. It is the truth on which the Japanese merchant fleet has been builded into world power within less than one generation. It is the basis of all that Germany has done for more than twenty years in her fight for maritime supremacy.

Yet that truth, that more than truth—that fact, that supremely important fact—has been underestimated, apparently, by the United States in a period when she is straining every nerve to get into the water within eighteen months 1,500 to 2,000 oceangoing vessels.

Who is going to man these vessels? Where are the men coming from? How will they be trained? Where will they be trained? In what time can they be trained to sail and to protect this vast new fleet which is destined again to fly the Star-Spangled Banner on the Seven Seas?

In the beginning of 1917 the Stars and Stripes flew over fewer merchant vessels than it flew over at the end of war in 1815. By the end of 1918 it will fly over more vessels than it ever flew over before, even at the beginning of the civil war, which was our high mark. Two years from now the United States will be second only to England in gross tonnage; in three years we may pass her. But who will sail the ships? That is the question of the immediate future.

There was a popular idea still existing in April of this year that an army would spring from the earth in some miraculous manner the moment a bugle call was sounded, but after six months of war we still lack a trained army. That idea has died a timely death. But it has sprouted in another and an equally noxious form. The idea now persists in many quarters that when the time comes for the ships to be launched, an army of sailors will spring, embattled, from the waterfronts of the nation and carry forth the new fleets victoriously.

Nonsense! Sailors are more difficult to get than soldiers. It takes longer to train a sailor than it takes to train a soldier. Moreover, we have discarded the idea of securing our soldiers by voluntary methods; we are conscripting them. But, unless we copy the German method, sailors can not and will not be conscripted. No one in authority has even suggested that. They must volunteer.

Suppose sufficient numbers do volunteer. They must then be trained, and it will take as long to train them as it takes to build the ships, and then they will be only novices.

Certain members of the Shipping Board were approached not long ago with the request to explain the Government's purpose in this dilemma. The answer, generally, was that there was enough bother at that time to find men to build the ships. One of the New York members of the board said:

"When the time comes Uncle Sam will enter the market like any other employer and pick up sailors along the waterfront. There are always plenty of sailors, and the navy is planning to supply the higher officers."

What will Uncle Sam be able to do along the waterfront? A private employer last Summer ran a liner advertisement for one week in the paper that most widely reaches such men, asking for common seamen of experience. He got fifteen replies and only two men proved available.

Before the war (in 1914) the wages of common seamen of the best grade were $20 a month and found. Today the lowest wages of common seamen are $75 a month, and certain British vessels are paying $100 a voyage, lasting from nine to fourteen days, with a $50 bonus in case of torpedoing. Even at that wage nearly every vessel sails short handed.

The fact is that the market of available trained seamen is exhausted. With the addition of perhaps a thousand new ships within the coming twelvemonth, it is inconceivable where the sailors are coming from unless steps are quickly taken to meet the inevitable demand.

Several weeks ago a dispatch from Chicago announced that a training school for sailors on the Great Lakes had been established in Michigan. On investigation this was found to be in a measure true, but that there were accommodations for only 300 or 400 men—barely enough to man a 7,000-ton boat.

Two hundred such ships will slip into the water on the Atlantic seaboard before next Summer. And not a real training school in existence for the men to man them! Where are 60,000 coming from—as large an army as supplied our regular military establishment five years ago? Another 40,000 to 60,000 will be required in the following year. Are they coming out of the air and the scenery like tree toads and orchids? Or are they going to spring to attention at the word of command like Mr. Bryan's mythical million of embattled farmers?

Conversation with a number of officials who ought to have this matter in hand left the impression that when the time arrived some junior naval officer, not competent enough to take even inferior command on a battleship, but plenty good enough for the merchant marine, would descend on Battery Park and Chatham Square, run up a sign, clap his hands, and promptly enlist enough bench warmers too lazy or two worthless to be employed elsewhere. Just how this flotsam crew was to box the compass, handle the sextant, knit and splice, heave the lead, lower boats, make landing in the surf, signal with the semaphore or write a log book, was not quite clear. Those trifling little technicalities were "just details that would be attended to when the time came."

While the writer was pursuing this subject, loath to believe that the matter had not already received careful and efficient attention, a ray of light shot through the general gloom of the situation. He received a letter from the "Naval and Merchant Marine Corps of the U. S. A., (inc.,)" and it appeared that Rear Admiral Bradley A. Fiske, retired, was the President and that the honorary council included the Governors of some fourteen States, and that Captain Lewis Till was the commandant, with headquarters in New York. This looked like an answer to the problem, but it appeared on investigation to be more a desire than a fact, much more a prospect than an actuality.

This organization has recently taken quarters (donated) in a private residence at 9 East Fifty-sixth Street, and its prospectus and plans are practical, feasible, thoroughly and reputably indorsed, and they hold much hope for the partial solution of the problem here stated. But it is a very small baby now. So far Captain Till has drilled 670 boys; he is striving to raise money to build a training ship that is worth $30,000, but which can be purchased for $12,000; and he plans a country-wide organization which eventually, if it prospers, will be able to supply the horrible lack that faces us in our new building merchant marine.

Captain Lewis Till, Commandant, Naval Merchant Marine Corps.

Captain Till, the moving spirit of the new organization, has a military rather than a naval record, having seen eight years of active service with the Royal School of Cavalry in Canada, serving through the Boer war and being in thirty-two engagements, having been for two years a member of the First National Guard of Missouri, stationed at St. Louis. Henceforth he proposes to devote himself, as a naturalized citizen of the United States born in Canada, to the needs of the Naval and Merchant Marine Corps. Military discipline in the training of men and young boys being the basis of all effective seamanship, Captain Till seems qualified to organize the corps, especially as he proposes to employ able seamen to supplement his work in the technically nautical branches.

The basis for hope in this new organization lies in the fact that it is going to seek out for the propagation of its idea the most fertile field in the country—the male youth from 16 to 20 years of age. All military observers and thinkers on military subjects agree that youth is the military age. Just as truly is it the marine age. In the adventurous years from 16 to 21 boys are overeager to seek the rigor and the delights of marine, as of military, experience. Moreover, under our present law, the military establishment of the United States has no place for those under 21. At the same time young men just under the restrictive age are the most anxious to "get into action." Thus the Merchant and Naval Marine Corps is plowing fertile ground.

The scheme is ambitious. Had it been working for the past two years, under Governmental supervision, and on a national scope, subsidized as such schemes are subsidized in all European nations and among the Japanese, there would not now be this problem of knowing where to get men for the new ships.

Captain Till proposes to establish posts in all the large cities of the United States, and, eventually, in many smaller cities. In these posts the young men will be organized and trained to prepare themselves for a life at sea. At first this must be done by a system of correspondence, as large sums of money for equipment and instructors are lacking. But even in the beginning it is expected that a visiting officer shall reach each post at least once every two months for inspection. His duties will be chiefly advisory. His aim will be to help every post to grow rapidly and to co-operate with the post officers.

Enlistment will, of course, be voluntary, and will bring from the young men only the requirement for work perhaps two nights a week, with a cruise in the Summer time of at least two weeks on the training ship. It is an extension of the Naval Militia idea, but as applied to those under 21. Captain Till believes that he will be able in this manner to enroll at least 100,000 young men during the first year of the corps. Of this number he believes that 25,000 would volunteer for the new merchant marine fleet. Of the 670 boys whom he has so far trained, 125 have enlisted in the army and the navy.

The training is to be free in all cases alike. Uniforms and all equipment are to be free. Nominal dues of a few cents a month to cover the local post expenses will be required from each member, but this will be under control of the young men themselves through their organized officers. During the war the corps will be specially trained to replace national guardsmen who have been called away for service abroad or in cantonments, and it will be used for policing bridges, water systems, and docks, as well as in handling crowds and suppressing mobs.

The work for the coming Winter, in this correspondence school system, includes courses in the following branches of nautical requirements: Hoisting and lowering boats, knitting and splicing, duties of the lookout, boxing the compass, the sextant, heaving the lead, landing in harbor, correct way to make a landing in the surf, sailing and rowing, signaling with the semaphore and the international code, reading the barometer, the port and starboard watch, how to write the log book, the rules of the road, and how to avoid a collision at sea. Supplemental to this will be four courses in military discipline; the manual of arms, the company drill, the efficiency to command, and how to obtain officers' and petty officers' rating.

It is a curious fact that the best response to the movement has come not from the seaboard, but from inland points. It seems that the boys of the prairies and the mountains are more anxious for the sea than the boys of the coast cities. A letter from Governor Alexander of Idaho, received a few days ago, accepting membership in the Honorary Council of the corps, expresses the inland feeling on the subject.

"I am with any movement of this kind, heart and soul," writes the Governor of Idaho, "and if your organization can bring our people to a realization of these principles that will fit the young men of our land as defenders of our free institutions, you will have performed a duty as patriotic as the men on the firing line of the battlefields."

Or, as Theodore G. Bilbo, the Governor of Mississippi, writes, "no one appreciates more thoroughly than I do the necessity, at this time and for some time to come, for training our young men in this branch, (the merchant marine.)"

Meanwhile, the Shipping Board says there will be a million tons ready by March 1. These boys won't be ready by that time. Who will man them?

Lenine Anti-American as Well as Pro-German

Most of the Bolsheviki Leader's Strength Is in Petrograd, According to War Photographer Who Has Just Returned from Russia

WHEN Donald C. Thompson, an American war photographer who was in Russia during the revolution and has recently returned to this country, asked permission of Lenine to take his picture the request was abruptly refused. And the reason given was because Mr. Thompson was an American.

"Americans," Lenine sent word, through an interpreter, "are capitalists. I will have nothing to say to an American."

"Then," said Mr. Thompson in telling the story, "I got mad. I told my interpreter to remind him that we were in Russia, and that Russia was a free country, and that even Nicholas had always allowed his picture to be taken. And Lenine simply repeated that he would have nothing to do with me because I was an American and intimated that I should find that country better suited to me than Russia at that time.

"Needless to say," he continued, "I didn't leave. I stayed on for months after that, through the July uprising and on into August. And I had a good deal to do with the Bolsheviki. I feel pretty sure that they are going to be permanently beaten in their effort to seize the Government. But it won't be because their power is impaired in Petrograd. They are very strong in Petrograd, for a good many reasons. In the first place, Petrograd is a nest of German intrigue, and the Germans can make the Russians believe anything. Then, too, Petrograd is a manufacturing centre and the workmen are concentrated there. And both because they are making them and because they have got control of the supplies already on hand, they have the ammunition.

"The thing that will conquer Lenine and his Bolsheviki is an army from outside Petrograd, an army that really represents Russia, and that represents, too, a Russian Government of all parties and peoples outside the capital. If Kerensky had taken his Government to Moscow in the first place, away from that hotbed of German intrigue, this latest outbreak would never have occurred. Recently, Kerensky did see this coming and tried to scatter the workmen, sending them to other parts of the country on a plea of food shortage in the capital. But it was too late then.

"And in Petrograd they follow Lenine. I remember the first time I came up against that man. English labor people had sent two representatives to Russia to congratulate the Russian people on the revolution, and I took my camera and went down to the station to see them come in. I was surprised to find crowds of people there with bands and all sorts of a jollification. And I tell you I was thrilled! So I said something about it to some men near me, and they said, 'English! Oh, no, this isn't for the English. We're all here to meet Lenine. The German Government has sent him in a special train across Germany!'

"Then, during the July uprising, I asked a lot of soldiers in the streets what they were fighting for and they said they didn't know! They had been ordered out and that was all they knew about it. And the way Lenine and his immediate followers have gone to work is to get control of the small assemblies that have the power to order out the men and then control the crowds in that way. The Russian crowd itself doesn't know anything; it believes whatever it's told. The man who has the last say is always the man who wins in Russia! And Russia has simply got to have a strong central Government."

Mr. Thompson, who has spent a good deal of time in Europe since August, 1914—the Antwerp bombardment was one of his minor adventures—chanced to arrive in Petrograd just twelve days before the revolution broke out last March. On the first day of the revolt he was arrested by the police for taking pictures and thrown into prison. That night the people seized the prison and set all the captives free, so he got his liberty—and, happily, his camera—once more.

"But when they took me out of jail," he said, "they insisted on my fighting for them. So they tied a red rag on my arm and pushed a rifle into my hand and told me I was a revolutionist. I didn't care what I was. I had my camera with me. And I watched the fight to see how it was going, because, I confess to you frankly, if I saw the revolutionary side losing I was going to flop first thing! Nothing happened to me at all, though, and I got back to my hotel, and the next day I got a good spot in the window and got ready to take my pictures. The mob was surging up and down in front of the hotel. There must have been 200,000 of them. It was a fine place! But they began to shoot at it, and the bullets came into the room and all around me, and smashed some things. And after awhile they set fire to the building and I had to throw my films out of the window and rush down after them. Of course things quieted down fairly soon. I met Kerensky, and afterward went twice to the front with him. And it was only a few weeks after the first Government overthrow that Lenine came to Petrograd, as I told you, and I failed to get his permission for a photograph.

"But do you know what the Czar did? I'll tell you, and I know it is true. At the time of the revolution the traitors in the Government of Russia had forced the food shortage, got machine guns ready to turn on the crowds, and were about to make a separate peace and explain to the Allies that internal disturbance had forced them to it. But that wasn't what happened. And the Emperor didn't know a thing about it until the revolutionists met his train and asked for his abdication. Then one of his Generals spoke up and said: 'You needn't abdicate. Let the Germans in on the Dvinsk front and everything will be all right.' And Nicholas said, 'No, I am not a traitor,' and signed the abdication decree.

He never was pro-German. He was simply too weak to rule. And the Empress was not pro-German, either, though many people always thought she was. She had cut loose entirely from Germany, had never gone back to that country, never had any German visitors, was very English in her sympathies. But she was unpopular because she was personally eccentric and disagreeable.

"It wasn't the royal family who were responsible for German intrigue. Russia made a big mistake always in allowing the Germans and pro-Germans in Russia to go freely about their business, plot, and spread false stories; the simple Russians, who believe anything, were no match for them. Since the revolution there has been no discipline of any sort. People just stand around and talk. Nobody does any work. And things like this happened: before the revolution the lands held by Germans had been in the process of being seized and sold to the Government; the new Secretary of Agriculture stopped that. I don't know why. I don't think he was pro-German. It was just a foolish playing into German hands. They ought to have locked them all up. They never did.

"Another thing that has been unfortunate in Russia is the false reports of the United States spread, not only by Germans, but by pro-German Russians returning home from this country after the revolution. They said that the war was unpopular here, that conscription had to be enforced at the point of a gun, that our camps were surrounded with barbed wire and guarded by machine guns so that the soldiers wouldn't desert! Of course, Elihu Root and his commission accomplished a great deal. The Railroad Commissioners have achieved wonders, when you think of all that's against them, and they are the sort of men who are not going to be beaten. Then there's Ambassador Francis himself. He is the best-liked man in Russia today. When there is trouble, Francis is right there in it. I got in the habit, very soon, of going to Francis when I wanted to be sure I had the truth. He never took any one else's say-so; he investigated the thing himself.

"What Lenine talked about when he got to Petrograd and what the Bolsheviki have actually wanted to do was to take all the money out of the banks, and even the private houses, and just divide it up! As a matter of fact, the Leninites have plenty of money. When they were arrested after the July uprising not one of Lenine's followers had less than 100 rubles on him, and some had as high as 20,000 rubles. They all said they got it from Lenine's headquarters."

During that abortive rebellion in July, when Lenine and his followers tried to seize Petrograd as they had seized Kronstadt, there were parades of great crowds of people carrying banners inscribed with such sentences as "Immediate Peace!" "Land and Freedom!" "Long Life to the International!" "Down with the Duma!" "Our Ministers are Capitalists!" and "All the Power to the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Deputies!"

During that uprising Mr. Thompson commandeered a motor car, put his camera in it—with a tripod sticking out of the tonneau like some strange new kind of a gun—thrust an army Colt in his belt, and, bringing his car to a halt on the very corner where the Cossacks and the Bolsheviki were coming into conflict, began to take pictures. The chauffeur was in a panic, and when the American ordered him to turn and drive into an even more dangerous part of the Litainie, he refused. Whereupon the photographer threatened to shoot him, and the chauffeur tremblingly gave in. Americans who saw Mr. Thompson shouted to him that he "must be crazy." But he had gone all over Europe taking war pictures and he wasn't going to be balked here. Why he wasn't hit, he probably doesn't know himself. At all events, he escaped from that fray. But once, a few days after the episode of the motor car, when he was afoot taking pictures on the Nevsky Prospekt, his camera was knocked out of his hand and he was obliged to fling himself flat on the ground to avoid the whistling bullets.

Naturally, Mr. Thompson did not seek his Russian pictures in Petrograd alone. He went to the front, of course. And he wandered about in other parts of Russia taking photographs and talking to the people. He has a picture, for instance, of the platform erected for speeches in front of the cathedral at Kronstadt, where each evening the bells call the people, not to prayer, but to listen to pro-Germans and pacifists. And he has photographs of the girl soldiers of Russia taken in various parts of the country, where, it is estimated, between ten and twenty thousand girls and young women are drilling and under arms.

"There is no talk of 'immediate peace' among those girls," said Mr. Thompson. "They are one of the reasons why Russia is going to win out.

"The peasants need a King. They need a Government like England—a limited monarchy. The head of it needn't have any power. That isn't why the peasants want him. They want some one to look up to and sing a song to. The Russian peasant has just naturally got to sing a song to some one every night when he goes to bed. He won't sing a song to Lenine. He won't even sing a song to Kerensky. But he wants some one. The educated classes in Russia want a republic. But the peasant needs a King, just for the sentiment of it.

"The last time I saw Nicholas," Mr. Thompson went on, "he was out in the palace garden spading up a flower bed. And on the fence all around peasants were climbing up, all over each other—some of them had walked a hundred miles to see the Little Father.

"Not that any one thinks of Nicholas coming back," he added, quickly, "I didn't meet a person in Russia who wanted Nicholas to rule again. He is too weak. But there is a strong feeling in favor of a limited monarchy, like England, with the Grand Duke Michael as its head, if—and only if—he should be elected as King by the vote of the country.

"Of course, Kerensky is the one man out of millions in Russia who has really emerged to power. And Kerensky can be the man of the hour and give the country the real Government it needs. As I said, the upper classes want a republic. The trouble with Kerensky up to now—I was with him a lot, and he is a fine fellow—has been his connection with the extreme Socialists. They don't represent Russia. They are just pulled about by German intrigue. Russia needs its strong and devoted Generals, like Gurko and Korniloff—they'd do anything for Russia. And if Kerensky breaks away once for all from the extreme Socialist, peace-at-any-price, break-open-the-banks gang, he can form a real Government for the country. He is a great orator, and he has unlimited nerve. I guess he has broken with them all right now. It looks to me as if Kerensky had been educated over night, away from that danger. So, perhaps, after all the chances are better than ever. But not in Petrograd itself. Petrograd is not Russia at all.

"They don't need ammunition in Russia," Mr. Thompson added. "They've got more ammunition there—machine guns and rifles—than anywhere else in the world. But the trouble is that in Petrograd, where so much of it is, the Bolsheviki have got nearly all of it.

"And Lenine and the others promise land to the peasants, peace to the soldiers, money to the workmen. And the Germans—there are so many of them who have lived in Russia for years and have 'double nationality' under German law—have been busy with their plots all the time. The whole trouble started," Mr. Thompson concluded sternly, "when they didn't lock those Germans up! The Russians were just too easy!"

Speeding Up the Mails for American Soldiers

Every Week 450,000 Letters Go to France, and Lack of Ships Has Complicated the Postal Problem—Cantonment Service Systematized

IN recent dispatches from the American front in France there was one paragraph to the effect that the only complaint our soldiers made was that when they returned to camp from the firing line trenches there was no American mail awaiting them.

The grievance of the soldiers was repeated the other day to the three men in the Postmaster General's Department in Washington who have the most to do with the getting of letters and other mail matter to all American soldiers. These men are John C. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, responsible for the mail service of all the camps and cantonments in the United States; Otto Praeger, the Second Assistant Postmaster General, in charge of the mail for all our expeditionary forces in France, and Robert L. Maddox, Superintendent of Foreign Mails, who had just returned from France where he had been at work for four months in organizing the postal service there for American troops. These officials freely admitted that there had been delays and that there must continue to be delays from time to time because of unavoidable conditions both here and abroad. For the most part these have been and will continue to be due to the wartime uncertainties of transportation, especially transportation across the Atlantic.

That the army itself appreciates the difficulties and is grateful for the mail service that has been established is indicated by the letters which have been received by the Post Office Department from General Pershing and from Major Gen. Blatchford, who commands the line of communications in France, commending the system that has been put in operation by Superintendent Maddox. It is through the headquarters of General Blatchford that the Postal and Military Departments co-operate.

"Possibly," said Mr. Praeger, in explanation of the complaint referred to, "the time when the soldiers from the firing line did not get the home mail they were hoping for came at the end of one of the eighteen-day periods in which it was impossible to send any mail from America because there were no ships going over. There have been two such periods since our troops arrived in France.

"We have two ways of sending the mail to the troops abroad. They are by means of the army transports and the merchant ships of the French Line, which, as a rule, has a sailing once a week. But there are not many French ships available for the purpose and it is sometimes necessary to cancel a sailing to haul a vessel off for repairs. Twice that has happened on occasions when no troopships happened to be ready to go, and that gave us the two unavoidable eighteen-day intervals with no mail departures. In one of those periods, however, I did send a batch of mail by a British ship, but that was of little help in the matter. The English are having all that they can do to get their own mail over, and we have used a British vessel for postal purposes only on this one occasion.

"All the American soldier mail for France originating west of the Mississippi River is made up at Chicago and all from east of the river is made up at New York. At those two points we work the mail down as fine as the company organizations. Each company has a mail sack of its own. All sacks for the companies of a single regiment are also kept together on their own rack, and the bags thus made up in New York and Chicago go intact to the troops. From the American port of departure to the arriving port in France the mail goes in either a troopship or a French liner. There are delays, of course, in this country in getting mail to the embarking point because of the wartime congestion of the railroads. There is further delay on the other side due to the same cause. There, of course, the land transportation is more severely taxed than it is here. The troops themselves with their supplies have the right of way and it generally takes two days after a troopship arrives in France before we can get the mail from that ship taken away and distributed to the interior points where our troops are stationed.

"Service by means of the French merchant ships is faster than by the transports, so we send letters on the liners whenever possible and put printed matter and parcel post packages on the transports. Between the two we will average a mail departure from this country about once in every four or five days. A letter mailed within twenty-four hours' railroad time from New York on the day before a sailing will reach the soldier in France to whom it is written in two weeks, perhaps a day better than that. Two weeks is about the best that is physically possible under war conditions. On the other hand, thirty days would be about the maximum due to an unfortunate combination of all the elements of delay, including such a serious one as a canceled sailing. But that has happened only twice.

"Another thing that takes time in the matter of the parcel post is the necessity of examining the contents of every package. It must be examined first by the Postmaster in the town at which it is mailed and again at the port of embarkation to make sure that it contains none of the articles prohibited by the postal laws. Failure in some instances on the part of local Postmasters to understand this rule has caused some congestion at the seacoast shipping point. The rule, of course, applies to Christmas packages and all other parcels and covers all intoxicants, poisons, inflammable material such as matches, all compositions which may kill or injure a person or damage the mails. Improperly packed perishable matter is also barred.

"So far, in the tens of thousands of parcel post packages that we have examined and shipped abroad, we have found not the slightest trace of willful violation of the rule, nothing in any sense malicious or suspicious. In some of the comfort kits sent from families to soldiers there have been boxes of safety matches. We have simply removed them and then let the kits go to destination.

"Of course, the Post Office Department lets go of the mail before it actually is delivered to the individual soldier. We take it to the railheads in France nearest to the various groups of our men. There it is delivered to the mail orderlies of the several regiments and done up in the company bundles. Distribution from that point on is by the army's own machinery.

"All this system works remarkably well save in the case of unavoidable exceptions to the general rule. For example, many thousands of reserve officers have been sent over to France without being attached to any particular organization when they first arrive. We can do nothing with mail addressed to them except deliver it to the Adjutant General at the main headquarters.

"Another problem has been made for us by the sending over of parts of regiments which have been merged with other organizations after their arrival, thus losing their numbers and designations which they had when they left America. A letter addressed to a man in such a merged regiment gets held up over there till we can learn what organization he has been blended with. Furthermore, many of our engineer officers are detailed with French and British organizations. We have to reach them through the headquarters of the French postal system at Paris. But delays due to failure to find men not clearly classified are being rapidly eliminated because the American army in France has now completed a very

French Father Wins Prize for His Record-Breaking Brood—All Born Healthy and Have Been So Ever Since

WHILE thousands of his fellow-countrymen are winning war medals, another Frenchman has won a distinction of another kind, one that is well-nigh unique. He is Francois Gannaz of Sallanches, in Savoy, and he has just received one-half of a prize awarded by the Institute of France because he is the father of a family of fifteen children, every one of whom is living and the oldest of whom is still under eighteen, having been born in March, 1899. The other half of the prize was awarded to Firmin Verjat of Buffières, in the Department of Haut-Saône, France, who has a family of sixteen children, all alive. This, at first sight, would seem to be more remarkable than the record of Gannaz, but the latter's fellow-villagers, who are inordinately proud of him, point out that the sixteen children of his rival range in age from 34 to 8, whereas Gannaz's oldest is a few months over seventeen, and his youngest only fifteen months old. Not only do they consider this aspect of the case more wonderful than the record of the chief of the Verjat family, but they call attention to the fact that it is quite likely that, within the next few years, there will be more little Gannazes than there are Verjats.

Henri Bordeaux, the well-known French novelist, now an officer in the French Army, was on furlough a few months back when he heard of Gannaz and his remarkable brood, and decided to pay the Savoyard a visit in his little village, which is not far from snow-covered Mont Blanc. He describes his experiences in an article entitled "The House of the Fifteen Children," published in a recent issue of L'Illustration of Paris.

Gannaz's House Before He Had to Add to It.

Gannaz feelingly informed Henri Bordeaux, had excellent appetites.

"Why, we have to get three thousand kilograms of bread alone in a year," she said. "It is quite a baker's bill, I assure you!"

Gannaz and his wife were married on April 12, 1898. Both of them were 25 years old at that time. It was not long before he found that his three-story chalet was too small for his growing family. So he set about putting on the fourth story shown in the illustration. In addition to providing space for the numerous brood it also accommodates boarders—for Gannaz soon found that he must raise money for the upbringing of his big family.

They are ten boys and five girls—together with their dates of birth:

Pierre Alexandre—March 5, 1898.
Clovis Alfred—June 9, 1900.
Alcide Leonard—Oct. 4, 1901.
Lucien Hubert—Nov. 1, 1902.
Fernand Auguste—Jan. 19, 1904.
Louis Zacharie—Feb. 12, 1905.
Lucie Caroline—June 8, 1906.
Léonie Olympe—June 28, 1907.
Marie Josephine—June 30, 1908.
Alice Dorothée—Aug. 6, 1909.
François Marcel—Nov. 3, 1910.
Marie Louise—Dec. 8, 1911.
Luc Xavier—Feb. 16, 1913.
Gabriel André—Nov. 5, 1914.
Jean Baptiste—Aug. 10, 1916.

Every one of them, M. Bordeaux learned, had been born healthy, and had continued ever since birth in the enjoyment of good health. The parents are doing their best to keep the whole family together as long as possible. Gannaz proudly informed M. Bordeaux that he provided all the children with a good home, despite the sacrifices which this made necessary.

Gannaz, His Wife, and His Fifteen Children, Ranged According to Age.

"None of them has to go wandering about away from home," he declared.

In spite of the worries incident to raising such a sizable family on the meagre resources of a humble agriculturist Gannaz is robust and happy, and never loses a wink of sleep. But his wife is not quite so philosophical about it.

"I sometimes wake up along about 2 o'clock in the morning," she confided to M. Bordeaux, "and begin to worry. I get thinking of the number of slates that are needed for the children at school, of the number of pairs of wooden shoes. And with the prices of everything going up, too! But I console myself by remembering that every one of the children is in good health."

Before M. Bordeaux left the Gannaz household the father told him that the family had added to its evening prayer an extra paternoster—the Gannazes are Roman Catholics—for "Monsieur Lamy of Paris," donor of the prize, including the welcome sum of 10,000 francs, which went to Gannaz.

Gannaz lined up his wife and their fifteen children before his house, which looks just like a Swiss chalet, and eyed them with paternal pride while the novelist inspected the troop. He also showed pride when he brought out the documents from the Institute telling him that he had been awarded one-half of the Etienne Lamy Prize. This prize, by the way, is no empty honor. In addition to the distinction involved, it bears with it a cash donation of 10,000 francs ($2,000)—no insignificant item for the father of a family of fifteen, all of whom, as Mme.

The King's Round Table—By Charles Alexander Richmond, President of Union College

MY armies have conquered Belgium
And hacked their way to the sea,
And shall I then not honor the men
Who have won this honor to me?"

The King looked round on a ravished land
By the spoil of a ravished town;
His ruthless hosts had wasted their coasts
And trampled their harvests down.

The first was a Captain of the Guard
With the blood-lust still in his eyes;
"We crept on Dinant in the dark
And took her by surprise.

"Then we bound the rascals arm to arm
And shot them against the wall.
And men are men—and war is war;
There were women enough for all.

"We burst the doors with the butts of our guns.
The fire balls burned higher and higher,
Till the red cock crowed on every roof
And mounted to every spire.

"And sabre and bayonet flashed in the light
As the waters flash in the sun;
Nor sabre nor bayonet rested that night
Till the work of the King was done."

The King brought forth the Iron Cross;
Said, "Wear it upon your breast.
That man shall have great honor
Who honors the King's behest."

The second was one whose face was wet
With the wet of the salt sea brine.
"They sailed to their fate where we lay in wait,
But we made never a sign.

"And some were watching the wheeling gulls,
Some watched the roll of the sea.
And some looked longingly into the West
And thought of their own country.

"Then we launched our bolt like a thunder stroke;
The great ship burst in twain.
A thousand or more who sailed from the shore
Will never come home again.

"And now they go drifting, drifting by
Like the tangled weed of the sea.
The wandering wave is a wide, wide grave
For all that company."

The good King took the Iron Cross,
Said, "Wear it upon your breast.
That man shall have great honor
Who honors the King's behest."

The airman came from his place in the sun.
Good tidings may he bring.
He circled round till he came to the ground
And stood beside the King.

"The night was dark as a sealed tomb
And still as a baby's breath;
When we bore down on the sleeping town
And scattered the sudden death.

"We took no toll of armed men,
Yet some there be who mourn—
An old man dead as he lay on his bed,
A bride with her babe unborn.

"Two children slept in each other's arms;
They sleep a dreamless sleep.
Long may men seek in the flaming wreck,
It's little they'll find to weep.

"Then we took flight through the black, black night,
For we feared what we had done.
We took no harm, though we heard the alarm,
And the roar of an English gun."

Once more the King took the Iron Cross,
Said, "Wear it upon your breast.
That man shall have great honor
Who honors the King's behest."

"What makes this churl in this company?"
Said the King to his Chancellor.
The poor civilian fell in the dust;
He was no man of war.

He kissed the hem of his robe and craved
That he suffer nor pain nor pang.
"I've done no gest at the King's behest
But I've chanted the Hasegesang."

The King has bent him low to the ground
And lifted him tenderly.

"Ye have but writ what the King has thought
And given it wings," said he.

"Now ye shall sing of my table round.
Pray Heaven it bear no loss.
And ye shall wear with the best knights there
The sign of the Iron Cross.

"Sir Wilhelm and Sir Rudolph,
Sir Christian and Sir Hans,
And all who have harried Belgium,
And ravished the daughters of France.

"And all who have hated England
With a hate that never can die,
Fair knights, sans peur et sans reproche,
The flower of my chivalry."

When Merlin knew what the King had done
He buried his head in his breast.
"Here is a very foul knighthood,
This King is a King unblest.

"King Arthur's knights were of gentle blood,
And could well of their courtesy.
The cross they wore was the Holy Rood,
The Cross of Christianity.

"Their quest was the quest of the Holy Grail,
Here is no holy quest."
And Merlin took his staff in his hand,
And fared him forth to the West.

comprehensive card index of its entire personnel, with every man's location accurately indicated. Of course the old causes of delay are bound to persist with each new batch of men or officers to arrive in France until they can get indexed, unless they are definitely attached to some organization from the start.

"Of course, there is always that familiar cause of delay which always exists in war or peace—the failure of the sender of mail to properly address it. A letter for a soldier in France should bear on the envelope his name and the designations of his company and regiment; nothing more nor nothing less than that. But we have thousands of letters simply addressed to So-and-so of the American Expeditionary Force or the American Army in France. For every such letter we have to apply the directory service test just as is done in the case of a letter addressed to a civilian in a large city without street and number being given.

"In spite of all these difficulties, we shipped more than a million letters for American soldiers in France in the first sixty days after our troops began to arrive here, and of that million and more only two thousand were undelivered. According to the October reports we are now sending 450 sacks of letters a week to our soldiers in France. That means 450,000 letters a week. At the same time we are sending 1,800 sacks of parcel post and printed matter each week. The mail traffic from the troops in France to the folks in America is considerably less, of course, because each soldier receives more letters than he writes. But, even so, we are bringing back from our troops 376,000 letters a month. There is very little printed matter and practically no parcel post bound this way from the army."

Robert L. Maddox, Superintendent of the Foreign Mail Service, went to England the middle of last June and, after studying the British system for handling soldier mail both in England and on the British front, began the work of building up the American system for the same service. When he left France early this month to return to Washington he turned the work over to John Clark, the United States postal agent in Paris with a working personnel of more than a hundred mail clerks at the several railhead Post Offices of America within easy reach of our troops.

"I have had the heartiest co-operation of the French postal authorities and of the American Army officers," said Mr. Maddox, "and I believe that we have got the best system that can be built up for the mail service of an army in the field. A letter from as far west as Kansas in this country was delivered to General Pershing at his headquarters in France fourteen days after it was mailed. The soldier mail from the eastern part of the United States ought not to take more than twelve days for delivery to the trenches. It will average just about that. If we sent it by way of England we would have to allow three or four days more. Going direct to France, mail shipped on a French liner requires about ten days; mail shipped on a transport takes anywhere from thirteen to twenty days.

Otto Praeger, Second Assistant Postmaster General, Who Directs the Handling of Mail for the United Expeditionary Forces in France.

"From the French seaport where the mail is unloaded from the vessels it is taken by French railway trains to our field Post Offices. I would like to say that the French Government charges nothing for this service nor for carrying our mail across the Atlantic on the French liners. Later on we will transport the mail from the seaport to the troops on our own supply trains.

"Our policy has been and is to establish a Post Office at every railhead that is near any considerable body of American troops, say from 5,000 up. So far we have twelve such Post Offices in France, and of course there will be more as the demands for mail service increase. From these offices the mail is delivered directly to the mail orderlies of regiments, through whom it gets to the companies and the individuals. From some of the offices we also have what corresponds to our rural free delivery in America for the benefit of small and scattered special groups of soldiers. To them the mail is taken in motor trucks furnished by the army for the purpose and manned by a military chauffeur and a civilian mail clerk.

"As in the French and British Armies, the greatest secrecy is maintained in everything that has to do with our mail service. Major General Blatchford, commanding the American line of communications, with whom I worked, never would give me a scrap of written instructions or information. Everything that we did had to be ordered orally. I would be told that a Post Office would be needed in such a place at such a time and then go to work to establish it. In each case the mail facilities were there when the troops arrived. No Post Office may be referred to by the name of the railhead or village in which or near which it is established. Instead of a name that would reveal its location, it has a number, and our postal clerks at the seaport office must have a record showing the location of every military unit with reference to the number of one of the twelve Post Offices."

Naturally the mail service for the American troops still held in the camps and cantonments of the United States is a much simpler matter so far as transportation is concerned. Nevertheless, it is a gigantic undertaking and makes up in greater bulk of mail delivered what it lacks in distance of haul.

"All told, we have to provide service for eighty-one camps in this country," said Mr. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, who has worked out the system. "Of this number, all the national army cantonments and the National Guard camps will average 40,000 men. And a camp of 40,000 soldiers is the postal equivalent of a city with a population of 200,000 people. That is because the man who goes into the army receives more letters in six months of his military life than he would get in six years of civilian life. He will also write many more letters than he would under normal conditions. This is as it should be, for the cheerful, encouraging effect of his correspondence with his family and friends is an indispensable asset in keeping a man in camp fit for his work as a soldier. It is a most important factor in the matter of soldier psychology, and the Post Office Department of the National Government is doing everything it can to further the welfare and the efficiency of all the troops by keeping them in daily touch with the people they have left at home.

"Our records show that we are delivering to the soldiers in the American camps and cantonments an average of 240,000 letters a day; also fifteen tons of parcel post packages every day. The outgoing letters written by the soldiers average about 80,000 a day for all the camps. The other forms of mail service are not so extensively used by the friends of the troops. We average only about 7,500 special delivery letters a month, 2,100 money orders aggregating $42,000, and 3,300 registered letters.

"Each camp is under the postal jurisdiction of the nearest large city which has the proper facilities for expansion of service to meet the new strain. The Brooklyn Post Office, for example, takes care of the national army camp at Yaphank, although it is sixty miles away. But the service is much better than it could be if placed under the supervision of one of the nearby village Post Offices. Camp Meade is served by Baltimore, twenty miles away, and so on through the entire list of camps.

"At each camp we have our own postal personnel living in barracks of our own furnished by the War Department.

"Of course there is some delay in delivering the mail to the individuals of each fresh draft contingent as it comes into camp, but that delay ends as soon as the new men are assigned to their military units and located in their barracks. Then, too, there is the delay which army mail suffers in common with that of civilians because of the unusual war conditions. Many trains are missing connections nowadays because of troop movements, and the right of way of other trains carrying military supplies and mails can move no faster than the trains which carry them."

Bolsheviki Catechism from Lenine's Pen

By ABRAHAM YARMOLINSKY,
Instructor in Russian at the College of the City of New York.

THE following attempt to formulate the platform of the socialistic faction which calls itself the Communistic Party, but which is commonly known as "Bolsheviki," is based on a pamphlet on the political parties in Russia, written by Nikolai Lenine, the Radicals' Premier of Russia. It is presented in the form of questions and answers. The wording closely follows that of Lenine.

Q.—What social class do we represent?

A.—We represent the class-conscious proletaries, hired laborers, and the poorer portion of the rural population.

Q.—What is our attitude toward socialism?

A.—We stand for socialism. The Workmen's Councils must at once take the necessary practical steps for the realization of the socialistic program. They must immediately take over the control of the banks and capitalistic syndicates, with a view to nationalizing them; that is, making them the property of the whole people.

Q.—What form of State organization do we advocate?

A.—We advocate a republic of Councils of Workmen, Soldiers, Peasants, &c. All the power must belong to them.

Q.—Should we support the Provisional Government?

A.—No. Let the capitalists support it. Our aim is to make the councils the only authority and power in the country.

Q.—Is it necessary to convoke the Constituent Assembly?

A.—Yes, and as soon as possible. The guarantee of its success lies in the growth of the councils in number and power, and in the arming of the masses of workmen.

Q.—Does the State need a police force of the usual type and a standing army?

A.—Not at all. The people must be made synonymous with the army and militia. The capitalists must pay the workmen for their service in the militia.

Q.—Should the army officers be elected by the soldiers?

A.—Yes. Furthermore, every step of the officers and Generals must be verified by special deputies from the soldiers.

Q.—Should the soldiers oust their superiors without authority?

A.—Yes. This is useful and necessary in every respect. The soldiers only obey and respect the authorities they elect.

Q.—Are we against this war?

A.—Yes, we are. We are emphatically against this imperialistic war and the bourgeois Governments conducting it, our own Provisional Government included.

Q.—What is our attitude toward the predatory international treaties (about the dismemberment of Persia, China, Turkey, Austria, &c.) made by the Czar with England and France?

A.—We are against them. It is our task to make it plain to the masses that it is hopeless to expect anything in this respect from the capitalistic Governments, and that it is necessary to transfer the power to the proletariat and the poorer element among the peasants.

Q.—What is our attitude toward annexations?

A.—We are against them. All the promises of the capitalistic Governments to renounce annexations are false. There is but one means to expose the fraud, namely, to demand the emancipation of the people, oppressed by their own capitalists.

Q.—What is our attitude toward the Liberty Loan?

A.—We are against it, for the war remains imperialistic, waged by capitalists, allied to capitalists for the interest of capitalists.

Q.—Can the capitalistic Governments body forth the will of the nations to peace?

A.—No. Conscious workmen cherish no illusions on this score.

Q.—Should all monarchs be deposed?

A.—Yes.

Q.—Should the peasants immediately take possession of the private lands?

A.—Yes, the land must be seized immediately. Strict order should be established through the agency of the Councils of Peasants' Deputies. The production of bread and meat should be increased, for the soldiers must be better fed. The damaging of cattle, implements, &c., cannot be allowed. It is necessary to organize the poor peasants and the agricultural laborers.

Q.—Should the fraternization at the front be encouraged?

A.—Yes. This is both useful and necessary. It is absolutely necessary immediately to encourage attempts at fraternizing between the soldiers of the two belligerent sides.

Q.—What color is our flag?

A.—Red, for the red flag is the flag of the universal proletarian revolution.

Service Flags All Over the City

Starry Banners Fly in Greater Numbers Every Day— Big Ones Flutter from Downtown Skyscrapers

FROM the one-starred squares that dot the windows of apartment houses, to the great banner with the figure 6,861 in stars that is the pride of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, service flags fly glowingly all over town these days. But if one stops to ask a question about one of them, the interest of the answer does not lie in the number of stars alone. That, the inquirer is told, is twelve, or twenty, or 200, or whatever it may be, but nine times out of ten there is another bit of information, delivered with bright, snappy pride: "There'll be more soon."

The service flag of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company is 52 by 32 feet in size. But even so large a banner as that can not hold 6,861 stars, and when it was found that the number of company employes in the United States service reached that figure, it was seen that some special arrangement had to be made. This was done; the figures themselves are set in blue stars in the flag's white centre. The employes of the American Telephone and Telegraph and associated companies enrolled or in active service are scattered through every branch of the army and navy, and come from every State in the Union. The flag was flung out for the first time from the Telephone and Telegraph Building at 195 Broadway on the morning of Nov. 9.

The service flag of the United States Rubber Company has 1,554 stars. The number of stars in the flag of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company is 1,260. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company has 569 stars in its flag. The Municipal Building's service flag has 393 stars, and the flag of the American Tobacco Company 325. The Public Service Commission's flag shows 257 men in the service.

A manufacturer of service flags says that he began to make them "on a basis of twelve stars or less." On that basis, he charges 5 cents extra for each star when the number is over 12. But if any one expected that the flag with more than 12 stars would be a rarity, he has only to look about him to be mightily astonished now. In the financial district, certainly, where at a little distance away the flags seem almost to cluster against the tall buildings in the narrow streets, it is the flag with "12 stars or less" that is rare. There is the Guaranty Trust Company with 220 stars.

"That," explained the man who has charge of the flag, "is our latest number. We are adding to it all the time."

At the National City Bank, which has a flag with 180 stars, the answer, striking the same note, was: "We had 104 men in uniform in August. There will be more soon."

The service flag of the New York Stock Exchange flies 87 stars, 63 for members and 24 for employes. J. P. Morgan & Co. have 73 stars in their flag; the Home Insurance Company, 75; Westinghouse, Church & Kerr, 70; the Equitable Trust Company, 60; the Chase National Bank, 61; the Bankers' Trust Company, 59; Chatham and Phenix National Bank, 59; Kidder, Peabody & Co., 53. These are some of the most thickly starred of the downtown flags.

But they are by no means the only big ones. Walking for only a few blocks in the financial section, one sees the flags of J. S. Bache & Co., with 32 stars; E. H. Hutton & Co., 13; Shearson, Hamill & Co., 15; C. I. Hudson & Co., 20; Merrill, Lynch & Co., 21; Post & Flagg, 22;

Harris, Winthrop & Co., 19; Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft, 11; the Franklin Trust Company, 18; the Central Trust Company, 15; the Metropolitan Trust Company, 20; Henry L. Doherty, 35; Goldman, Sachs & Co., 13; Brown Brothers & Co., 28; Hanover National Bank, 35; Mechanics' National Bank, 37; United States Mortgage and Trust Company, 28; William A. Read & Co., 40; New York Title and Mortgage Company, 18; American Exchange National Bank, 18; the Lawyers' Mortgage Company, 29. These are not all, only some of the most noticeable.

The first flag in this section was that of the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, which was hung out on Sept. 28, with 25 stars. The number has since been increased to 28. In regard to the flag which flies so beautifully from the Municipal Building, there is a possibility of misconception. The 393 stars might not unreasonably be supposed to stand for the total number of municipal employes in war service. But they do not; this is the number of municipal employes with the colors from the Municipal Building alone.

Totals of men contributed to the country's service by some of the large corporations run very high. The American Express Company, for instance, reports that about 1,000 of its employes have volunteered. The Standard Oil Company of New York has 345 men in the country's service. Four hundred and fifty men have left the New York Edison Company to join the nation's fighting forces, and among the allied companies 357 have gone from the Consolidated Gas and affiliated companies, 108 from the United Electric Light and Power Company, and 30 from the New York and Queens Electric Light and Power Company, 93 from the William R. Grace Company, and 50 from the Johns-Manville Company. The service flag of Rogers Peet & Co. has 80 stars. The Hippodrome has 87.

Fifth Avenue is gay with service flags. Some of the conspicuous ones from Fourteenth Street to Fiftieth are: P. K. Wilson, 32 stars; Meyers, 16; the Methodist Book Concern, 16; Garfield National Bank, 14, (twelve of these are for clerks and two for Directors;) Emery & Beers, 32; Einstein-Wolff Company, 12; Ovington's, 9; the Waldorf-Astoria, 91; Altman's, 240; Columbia Trust Company, 39; McCutcheon's, 14; Best's, 19; Tiffany's, 84; Franklin Simon, 31; J. & J. Slater, 5; Bonwit & Teller, 21; Robin, Hewlett & Co., 10; Knox, 42; Bankers Trust Company, 60; Irene, 12; Sherry's, 36; Harriman National Bank, 6; Knoedler's, 16; W. & J. Sloane, 51; Black, Starr & Frost, 6; Frank's, 6, and Marceau, 12. Noticeable from Fifth Avenue are the nearby flags of Yale & Towne, with 180 stars; Stern Brothers, 54; the Aeolian Company, 127; Hotel Manhattan, 33, and the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, 68.

Altman's and Yale & Towne thus have the largest number of stars among the flags of Fifth Avenue, but the credit of being the first to hang out service flags in this part of the city goes to the Methodist Book Concern and Franklin Simon & Co. The former had out its flag, with fourteen stars at that time, for the National Guard parade on Aug. 30, and if not the first in the city was certainly the first in the Twenty-third Street neighborhood. Franklin Simon & Co. displayed their flag in the early part of September, and were the first in that section of the shopping district.

The service flags that are mentioned here offer a fairly representative list, and only that. It could not very well be exhaustive, for one company, said to be the largest manufacturers of such flags in the city, but by no means the only one, reports that it has made in the neighborhood of 100,000 service flags.

Rembrandt Etchings from Morgan Collection

THE prints division of the New York Public Library has arranged an exhibition of about 170 etchings by Rembrandt, selected from the J. Pierpont Morgan Collection. Mr. Weitenkampf says of it:

"Recurring exhibitions of Rembrandt's etched work are as interesting as desirable, and as inevitable as are the performances of the plays of Shakespeare or the symphonies of Beethoven. The present exhibition consists of a selection of the artist's best plates, in impressions usually impeccable, and often in states of great rarity. * * *

"The chronological arrangement of an artist's work serves best for the study of his progressive development, especially when his productions are as numerous, as diverse in subject matter, as varying in changing manner of expression, as are these etchings by Rembrandt. Classification by subject, (i. e., portraits, landscapes, religious, genre,) as indicated by Bartsch, has generally, but not always, been followed in Rembrandt exhibitions. On the initiative of Sir Seymour Haden, the Burlington Fine Arts Club's exhibition of 1877 was arranged chronologically, as were those of the Boston Museum (1887) and the British Museum, (1899.)

For the permanent collection of Rembrandt's etchings in the British Museum a similar course was followed, and A. M. Hind's catalogue of that collection has been employed in the arrangement of the present exhibition. The visitor will thus be able to follow the unfolding of Rembrandt's art throughout the three periods (1628-39, 1640-49, 1650-61) into which Haden divided it according to style and method. Later, the exhibition will be rearranged and classified by subjects. This unusual plan will give an opportunity to study the prints both by chronological arrangement and according to subject matter."

Woodcuts at Metropolitan Museum

Example of Chiaroscuro Printing in Exhibition of Early Italian Wood Engraving at the Metropolitan Museum.

THE exhibition of Italian woodcuts in the Print Department of the Metropolitan Museum is one of very great distinction, illustrating the history of the art in Italy from the middle of the fifteenth century to the beginning of the seventeenth. The technical boundary to the exhibition is fixed by Mr. Ivins at the moment of discovering that engraving tools can be used across the grain of the wood. That discovery introduced the "tint" and led the ambitious engraver away from the old positive line which expressed the natural limitations of the medium.

The characteristics and development of the Italian woodcut are described by Mr. Ivins in the catalogue with a degree of knowledge that makes his description an affair of value to the initiated student of prints and with an art of statement that enables the most ignorant to follow the succinct history with understanding and interest. He reminds the visitor to the galleries that in most instances he is looking with twentieth century eyes at the handiwork of contemporaries of Columbus, whose point of view, thoughts, and conventions of expression are not as his own, whose knowledge, in some directions less than our own, also embraced much that we have unlearned and much that we have forgotten. He also reminds us that the pictorial woodcut has a much shorter history than either painting or sculpture, dating back no further than the early years of the fifteenth century. Comparing the Italian with the German type of woodcut, he finds the initial difference between them traceable to the different tastes of the bookbuying public in the two countries. In Germany the woodcut book was bought by the wealthier classes and conformed to the calligraphic and miniature traditions with which they were familiar. The Italian bibliophiles, on the other hand, looked askance at books decorated with woodcuts, leaving them to the unlearned public who liked to see in their picture books "a constant and steady reflection of the paintings and sculpture and architecture with which they were familiar in the churches and other public buildings."

This accounts in some measure, no doubt, for the later popularity of the chiaroscuro print, in which one neutral color in two or three degrees of intensity gave a plasticity comparable only to the sculptural reliefs of friezes and other architectural ornament. Even the paintings reproduced in this manner for sixteenth century Italians to use for decoration, as we have used photographs of masterpieces, are hardly as plastic in effect as these "chiaroscuro" prints with their one color and their definite modeling. Such prints, we are told, were hung on the walls of the private houses and subjected to all the familiar accidents and neglect of small households, hence the large number of examples in good condition in the present collection is noteworthy.

Ugo da Carpi, who is believed to have taken over from the Germans and adapted to chiaroscuro printing a technical method developed by Burgkmaier and his woodcutter, is represented by a brilliant group. "The Death of Ananias," after Raphael, printed from three blocks, shows the method at its most logical moment, perhaps. The brown ink conveys a sense of color without compromising the simplicity of the monochrome; the high lights are bland, the halftones broad and clear, and the deep bounding line adequately symbolizes the dark shadow from which the forms emerge in high relief. "Saint Peter Preaching," after Parmigiano, is more impressionistic. It might be a reproduction of one of the modern works of "pictorial sculpture" with which we have replaced the earlier "sculpturesque pictures." The planes flow into each other, the contours are undulating, the bounding line is used only to indicate specially accented depths; it still looks more like a reproduction of a bas-relief than like a reproduction of a painting.

To go back to the linear artists before 1500, and those active at about that time, the architectonic character of most of the designs is as striking as the sculptural character of the chiaroscuro work. Again the talk is all of buildings and sculpture, the permanent features of a country in which all human activities are seen against a noble architectural background. Take, for example, the "Canon Picture" in Missale Vallisumbrosae, lent by Mr. Morgan. An architectural framework is erected within the rectangular page, the spaces not occupied with architectural ornament being filled with little pictures related to the central panel representing the Crucifixion. Set into the bases of the columns on either side of the panel are subjects of monks reading and praying in their cells. A knight engaged in some holy scrimmage fills the space between the bases. The arch of the lunette over the panel contains the figure of God the Father bending over to watch the scene depicted below. Filling the spandrels are figures of men with books. All these pictures are peculiarly expressive, the gestures and poses reaching the exaggeration of emotion found in the Flemish primitives oftener than in the Italian. The women at the Cross are overcome with heavy sorrow. The gesture of the Father bending toward them from above is one of deepest compassion. This contrast between the emotional characterization and the severe architecture of the framework emphasizes the beauty of each. A deviation from precise formality that also adds to the beauty of the general effect is the extension of the landscape background beyond the frame of the design.

In the Florentine group of book illustrations the use of black is particularly to be noted. The Savonarola series (1496 to 1500) are especially marked by characteristic small patches of black introduced with apparent casualness as a niche in a shadow, as the black tiling of the typical black and white Italian floor, as the robes and hoods of the religious, always appearing as an accidental and natural element in the composition, and always placed with the tact that implies careful preconsideration. No. 37, "A Man and a Woman in Prayer Before an Altar," passes somewhat beyond the field of the purely decorative, and foreshadows the new school of drawing that seeks to win from a line its utmost emotional significance. Here there are almost no patches of black. Even the black drapery against which is hung a crucifix above the altar is broken up in surface with a rapid, rather coarse, hatching of white line. The meeting of the walls of the room is marked by richly modulated lines, and the indications of the shadow back of the figures are single notes of black flowing off into the white spaces in a way that gives life and vigor to the effect and that would be fully appreciated by such a modern master of line as, say, Preston Dickinson.

was more in harmony with the sumptuous and joyous nature of the Venetians of his day. He gathered up whatever he could find of delectable or of brilliant in nature or in man, in costumes or in art. luxury, as evidenced in the magnificence of buildings, of garments, of hangings, in the representation of concerts, of festivals, of processions or of banquets, beauty, as manifested in exquisite and voluptuous creatures, all love and smiles—all these the master knew how to bring into harmony; bathing them in an envelope of transparent color; in veiled or opaque tones he showed no less originality than in his sunny high lights, vibrant with joy and vigor. Thus he gave a new palette to art, the decorative value of which is still maintained, for nothing has so far been found to surpass it in clearness and nobility.

In the work of Tintoretto we find elements that are of an entirely different, not to say antagonistic, character. The clear and diffused coloring of Paolo in Tintoretto becomes a gloom irradiated by gleams of light, as if the scene in every case had been painted in a thunderstorm; the composed dignity of Veronese is exchanged for the restlessness and tumult of a painter who seized his motives with a rapidity that was literally instantaneous; the richness and display of the one is replaced by the ruggedness and scornful impatience of the other.

Underwood & Underwood.

Scene in Venice, Showing Campanile.

Of these rich and brilliant Veronese canvases, Venice has many. "One of the finest," said Mr. Blashfield, "is the 'Triumph of Venice' in the Hall of the Grand Council in the Ducal Palace, another, the 'Rape of Europa,' in the Anticullegio. And there are beautiful Veroneses in the Academy."

Of the ceiling paintings in the Ducal Palace, the finest are said to be Veronese's "Neptune and Mars," "Faith," and, especially, "Venetia Enthroned on the Globe." Another famous Veronese, in the same room, is the "Christ in Glory."

In speaking of the ceilings in the palace, Mr. Blashfield pointed out that several, which were undoubtedly in the manner of Veronese, were now variously attributed, and some were probably by his pupils or followers.

Among the paintings by Veronese in the Academy are "The Feast in the House of Levi," "Hercules and Ceres," and "Madonna Enthroned, with Saints." One of his most brilliant works is the "Betrothal of St. Catharine" in the Church of Santa Catarina. Other Veronese canvases that are well worth cherishing are those in the Church of San Sebastiano—"Veronese's Church"—which he largely decorated, and where he is buried.

An earlier master of the Venetians, who has left many paintings in the city where his work was done, was Giovanni Bellini. His "Virgin and Saints," in the Church of the Frari, is one of the great Madonnas of the world, and is commonly named with Titian's "Assumption" and "Madonna of the Pesaro Family" as one of the three greatest pictures in Venice. His four allegorical pictures in the Academy are cited as "examples of incomparable charm" in the treatment of allegorical subjects. The room which contains these and several other paintings from his hand houses also the "Madonna with Mary Magdalen and St. Catharine" and "Madonna of the Two Trees." Another well-known canvas of his is the "Madonna Enthroned" in the Academy.

Gentile Bellini, Giovanni's half-brother, painted several pictures which are among the treasures of Venetian art—the "Procession in the Piazza of St. Mark," and others are in the Academy. And Jacopo Bellini, father of Gentile and Giovanni, who has many canvases in Venice, is rated as "the earliest of the heroes of the true 'pittura Veneziana.'"

One of the most-loved paintings in Venice is Palma il Vecchio's "Santa Barbara," which, though housed in the Church of Santa Maria Formosa, is said to have escaped injury when that church was partly destroyed by an Austrian bomb some time ago. Palma il Vecchio has also a beautiful "Holy Family" in the Academy.

Carpaccio is another artist whose work enriches the galleries and churches of Venice. His "Scenes from the Legend of St. Ursula," nine paintings hung in the "Sala del Carpaccio" in the Academy, are perhaps the best known of his canvases, but he has other beautiful things that visitors to Venice love. Mr. Blashfield calls special attention to the "St. George Killing the Dragon" in the Scuola of San Giorgio degli Schiavoni.

Mantegna's "St. George," Benifazio's "Banquet of Dives," Boccaccio Boccaccino's "Madonna," Cima da Conegliano's "Tobias and the Angel," and Paris Bordone's "Fisherman Presenting the Doge with the Ring Received from St. Mark," are among the features of the Academy. The last named is said by Burckhardt to be "the most beautiful ceremonial picture in existence." There is a fine Giorgione in the Palazzo Giovanelli.

In sculpture Venice also has treasures. The Church of the Frari contains some noted monuments—the early Renaissance tomb of the Doge Niccolo Tron, by Antonio Rizzo; a statue of St. Jerome, by Alessandro Vittoria; the great wooden equestrian statue of the Roman Prince Paolo Savelli; and a figure of John the Baptist in wood by Donatello. Andrea Verrocchio's equestrian statue of Bartolomeo Colleoni, in the Campo Santo Giovanni e Piolo, is the most famous work of its kind in Venice. The celebrated bronze horses of St. Mark were long ago, we have been told, moved from their perilous situation in the great Piazza.

But nothing can make safe the Piazza itself, and the architecture that is, after all, the unique treasure of Venice. St. Mark's is probably better known to the people who have never seen it than any other church in the world, while to those who have seen it, its wonder is to be cherished forever. Its interior is, as Mr. Blashfield said, "in some ways the most precious thing in Venice." There is nothing like this strange, jewel-like interior, with its marvelous mosaics—some of them by Tintoretto, some going back to the twelfth century—its fine antique reliefs, its statues and altars, its whole architectural and decorative scheme.

After the great central glory of St. Mark's—"a long way after," Mr. Blashfield points out—comes the Ducal Palace, with its curious inversion of the usual values in its lacework foundation below the solid upper walls. Then there are several churches that are among the treasures of the world—Santa Maria dei Miracoli, San Giorgio Maggiore on its island, the delightful Renaissance church of Santa Maria della Salute, the Gothic churches of Santi Giovanni e Paolo and the Frari, the church of the Redentore, on the island of the Giudecca, San Stefano, and Santa Maria del Orto.

The Piazzetta and the Court of the Palace of the Doges are loved by all who love Venice. And among the famous palaces that rise from the Grand Canal it is only necessary to name a few to recall that individual character of architecture that can only be classified as "Venetian." Among these are the former Loredan and Farsetti (now the Municipio) Palaces, the Dona, Saibanti, Businello, and Da Mosto, most of which are near the Rialto. The influence of Gothic in the modification of Venetian architecture is shown in the Ca D'Oro, and in the Contarini-Fasan Palace, as well as in the "Casa degli Evangelisti." One of the finest palaces in Venice is the early Renaissance Palazzo Vendramin Calergi. Other palaces are the Corner Spinelli, the Grimani, the Pesaro, the Palazzo Rezzonico, where Browning died, and the Palazzo Corner della Cà Grande, built by Sansovino.

Naturally, there are in Venice rare treasures of jewels, plate, laces, old and beautiful historical things. Those in the Civic Museum and the Treasury of St. Mark's may especially be mentioned. There are also some fine historical relics in the Arsenal.

"Before all else, Venice is an art city," said Mr. Blashfield. "For beauty, it is the place of all places to me."

New Material for Dressing Soldiers' Wounds

DR. ALEXIS CARREL is experimenting in the New York hospitals with various kinds of dressings made of sphagnum moss, officially adopted for dressings by the Red Cross.

When there came a serious shortage in cotton and gauze for the German hospitals, sphagnum moss, an old household remedy for cuts, boils, and burns, supplied the deficiency. The Allies were next to feel the shortage of cotton and gauze, and the peat bogs of Ireland and Scotland were ravaged for the feathery substitute.

The moss is found in fresh water bogs not far from the ocean. It grows close to the water's edge, which makes the gathering of it a rather risky undertaking, unless one enjoys the sensation of walking on a quaking surface into which boots are apt to sink if one stands in one spot too long.

The best grade of sphagnum is the papillosum, which has a yellow top. Little fronds circle around the stem, each frond covered with tiny leaves rolling themselves close to form little cups which hold moisture better than does absorbent cotton. This grade of sphagnum, when dried, is made up into various sizes of dressings, which are applied to open suppurating wounds, particularly those made by the terrible curtain of fire, and to abdominal wounds. Dr. Carrel's method of treating these wounds by keeping them open is generally used in the hospitals of the Allies.

Sphagnum moss dressings are said to be superior to absorbent cotton, because they are much lighter, more bulky, and more absorbent. By a kind of capillary action the moisture is drawn away from the surface of a wound, keeping it clean and thus aiding nature. It does not clog or cake, as absorbent cotton does, when left on too long. In fact, the number of dressings of a wound can be reduced by any quantity of sphagnum.

There are other grades of the moss, more light and feathery, which are made up into larger pads for dysentery or for rest pads.

When the supply of moss from Scotland showed signs of depletion, Lady Stoppford Brunton, daughter of Professor John Porter of Magill University, Canada, requested her father to find out what supply Canada could offer. Dr. Porter has been the pioneer in the work in Canada, which is as yet limited, owing to the shortage of transportation. It is said that the coast of New England certainly must have the moss in sufficient quantities to assure any amount of surgical dressings when the call comes to this country from the other side. The bogs will be frozen over shortly, but in the Spring the work will be opened up fully. However, for a Winter supply, the coast of the State of Washington, being open all the year round, ought to furnish any quantity of sphagnum.

Dr. Carrel is experimenting with three kinds, one all made of sphagnum, one of the moss with an absorbent cotton layer on the top, and one of a Florida moss used as a support for the more delicate sphagnum. These dressings are covered with a grade of lawn running seventy threads to the inch. Such close-woven texture is necessary to prevent possible siftings.

The Surgical Dressings Committee of New York or the Woman's Bureau of the Red Cross of the New York Division can supply the moss.

With the President on a Forenoon Stroll

NOT everybody who visits Washington is satisfied with sending home a souvenir postcard showing the Monument or the Capitol. Some write real letters. Some keep diaries. At least one man from Kansas keeps a diary, and the red-letter day in it so far is the day on which he saw the President, not as anybody might see him, on a platform or reviewing stand or riding by in an automobile. Better than any of those ways, this diary keeper saw the President taking an unusual walk all alone to make a call.

It was on a recent Sunday forenoon, a day of perfect weather and that first Fall coolness that puts vigor into the system and suggests a light overcoat. The President had on a light overcoat and his step was full of vigor, two facts that were duly noted in the diary. Pennsylvania Avenue in front of the White House was almost deserted, so the walk was begun without the formation of a crowd to trail along in the rear. But the Kansas man happened to be passing, one of three or four persons who saw the President, and crossed the avenue and walked through Lafayette Park at a respectful distance behind the two Secret Service men.

No man ever seemed so completely detached from a bodyguard, and if this were not an age of printed photographs the Sunday morning stroll would have been a complete success as an incog outing. As it was, everybody going in the opposite direction recognized the President and saluted, but only the original small group followed on for the walk.

"What do you call that White House gate the President came out of, the one next to the War Department building?" asked one of the group, who proved to be the man from Kansas, of another trailer. "I am keeping a diary and want every detail accurate. I mail it home every night to my family out in Kansas to read. This is the first time I've ever seen the President."

"That was the west gate," replied the new acquaintance, and the diary keeper shortened his step so as to get the fact down legibly, without too much joggling.

The President walked straight out Sixteenth Street for six blocks. He looked out for himself in getting safely across Scott Circle, just like the ordinary citizen with a due regard for safety first. The Secret Service men did not mar the pleasure of the stroll by going ahead to hold up the automobiles that were swinging around the Circle, and the drivers were too intent upon taking the curve to notice the President particularly.

Half a square beyond the Circle Mr. Wilson stopped at a Sixteenth Street House, went up the steps alone, and rang the bell, which was not answered until after a delay of a minute or more. It seemed altogether too long to the Kansas man for the President of the United States to have to wait, as he confided to his Washington friend and voluntary guide when they sat down on some steps opposite to see what would happen next.

The diary keeper took advantage of the halt to write down the things he had noticed up to that moment, with the help of his companion.

"What was that big house with the long extension and high iron fence on the opposite side from the President as we came along? I noticed the President looking over at it."

"That was the Russian Embassy."

"Oh, really. It didn't seem to worry him any to be reminded of Russia. I noticed it was about there that he gave the dried leaves along the sidewalk a good clip with his cane."

"Yes, I saw that, too. You want to put it down, for it shows that a man is feeling fit when he thinks of the fun of hearing the rustle of a stick through dried leaves. It wasn't a golf stroke—just a normal boy's slash with a stick. I bet four dollars the President wished he could kick his way through those leaves. It is more fun than using a stick, and the thing to do on a morning like this."

"All right—dried leaves, cane, crisp weather, he feels like a boy in the woods—now I'll know what that means when I write this all out for the family. What else did you notice that I didn't?"

"Well, you spoke yourself of the delay in opening that front door after the President rang the bell. I'd put that down. It shows he isn't nervous or irritable from overwork. He rang only once, and then stood there, perfectly serene, looking up at the sky and thinking about something. If it had been Roosevelt, he would have rung that bell four times in the course of that wait. He would have wanted to kick the door in. Make a note that Wilson is patient."

"Fine! This will be the best day's report I've sent home since I've been here—patient, wears silk hat, light overcoat—my folks will read this to the neighbors."

"Yes, and the neighbors will tell what a time you are having in Washington, and on the second or third telling they'll get it twisted around to a report that you and the President walked up Sixteenth Street together."

"Well, I can't help that. I put down only the truth. I do think it is very likely that my grandchildren, if they read this diary in the years to come, may possibly think or at least tell their friends that I spent some time with Mr. Wilson at the national capital during the war. But that will please them and will not hurt the Government either now or then. Do you realize he has been in there now more than half an hour? Who lives in that house?"

"I don't know. If I were keeping a diary for my grandchildren I probably would put down that this might be the home of Colonel House, but I haven't the least idea."

"There is a church on the corner and that sounds like the closing hymn. I hope he doesn't come out just as church lets out, when the crowd will come along to see him and follow him back."

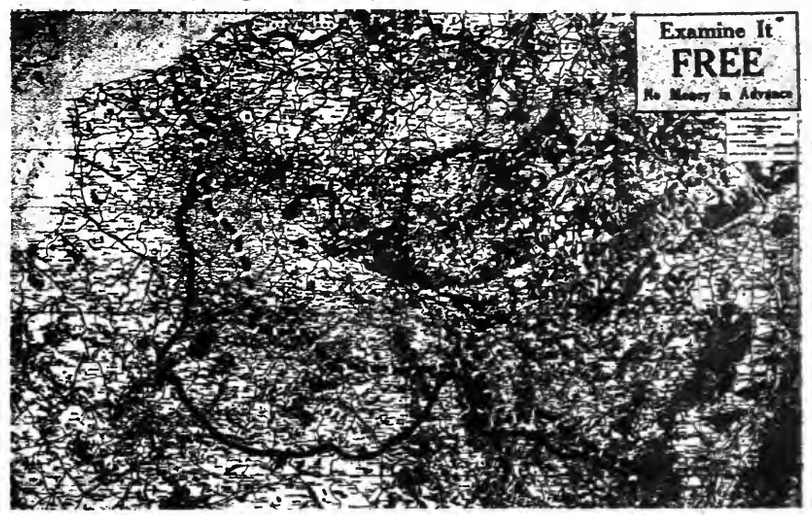
"I see you like to be alone with the President."

"Well, it seems more dignified, less as if you were butting into his privacy, to have him alone, instead of following with a crowd. There he comes now. Who are those people coming out with him?

"Why, that's McAdoo and Mrs. McAdoo, the President's daughter, and young McAdoo. That solves the mystery of the house. It is where the Secretary of the Treasury lives. This is a family party. I guess I won't trail them back to the White House."

"You're right. I guess I won't. Thank you very much for helping me out and telling me who Rochambeau and McAdoo were and about the Russian Embassy."

The Most Complete Single Map of the Western Front



Follow the American Troops in France

THE photograph above is a reproduction of the most complete single map of the Western Front ever published. It is 28x36 inches in size, but folds into a convenient cover, 5½x7½ inches, just right to be carried conveniently in the pocket for frequent consultation. It is printed on excellent paper, and can be had mounted on cloth, if desired, at slight extra cost.

Most existing maps of the Western Front are valueless because they are not indexed, or because they do not contain the smaller places.

Over 7,000 Villages Towns and Hamlets

On this new map there are shown more than 7000 places. The State of Illinois contains about the same number of square miles as shown on this map, and in Illinois there are less than 1700 places of 100 or more inhabitants.

In addition to over 7000 towns, villages and hamlets, this new map gives all woods, fortresses, fortified towns, naval arsenals, forts, redoubts, batteries, aircraft depots, wireless stations and railways. The forests and woods are indicated in green, giving the map an attractive appearance, and adding a strategical feature of importance.

The scale of the map is 10 miles to the inch. It extends west to Ashford, England; north to Antwerp, Belgium; east to Frankfort, Germany; and south to Orleans, France.

It shows for comparison the battle line of 1914, when the Germans were almost at the gates of Paris. The ground gained by the Allies, therefore, may be plainly seen.

It is without exception the most satisfactory map of the Western Front which has been engraved. It has been prepared especially to throw light on movements as they occur. It may be examined with ease, for the type is bold and clean cut.

A Complete Index Makes Locating Easy

An index of towns and villages accompanying a map of this kind has been proven an absolute necessity. The smaller towns are the ones usually mentioned in the news dispatches. They are not to be found on ordinary maps, and the locations of most of them were, and still are, utterly unknown to the general public, but unless their locations are known their strategical importance cannot be grasped.

Nothing is more unsatisfactory than searching all over the map for a small place that may and may not appear upon it. However, this loss of time and patience is now at an end, for the index which accompanies this map makes it vastly more useful and valuable. The index contains over 7000 names. An idea of the importance of this statement may be gained from the fact that 90 per cent. of the war maps available today contain less than 500 names. This index is bound in with the map and enables one to locate instantly any one of the 7000 places mentioned.

Send No Money

The great value of this map is so apparent that a copy will be sent on approval, without a penny in advance. If after examining this map, you decide to keep it, send only $1.00 for the plain, or $2.00 for the cloth-backed map. If not delighted with the map and index, simply return it and you will owe nothing. With America actively engaged in the war—with American troops already in France and thousands more going, interest in the Great War is more vital than ever, and Americans will want to follow every change in the situation from day to day. To intelligently read your newspaper, you must know the location of the various towns, vantage points and other places mentioned. This map will return to you many times its cost in your clearer understanding of conditions.

Every real American will have a copy of this map during the coming months.

The Book of Knowledge

The Children's Encyclopaedia

Answers Every Question a Child Can Ask

Can your child read intelligently and tell you interestingly and correctly about the familiar things which he sees around him? If not, he is not educated, and has not even started on the road to an education.

It is not enough to know that salt comes out of the earth and sea, or that sugar is obtained from sugar-cane and beet-roots, or that rubber flows from certain trees when they are tapped—we must know every step in the processes by which these things are obtained and made use of. We must know the way in which the tiny coral animals build their beautiful reefs, and the way in which man builds his lighthouses in the bed of the sea. We must know how the fibre of the cotton is separated from the seed, and who invented the machines that made cotton so cheap. THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE is the simplest scheme of knowledge eve presented to the world.

Place THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE in your home—your child will grow up to thank you.

Pictures Speak Louder Than Words

THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE possesses in a marked degree the power to awaken and stimulate growing minds, first and foremost, because it is illustrated with thousands of delightful educational pictures. There must be pictures to attract and hold the child's attention—full page illustrations and plenty of them, which tell the story in a striking and artistic manner, and impress the important knowledge of the world upon his mind in a way that can never be forgotten. The child learns more and faster through the eye during the earlier years, when he should be acquiring the love of learning.

In the household where THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE has become the source of joy and usefulness it is just as common a thing to see father or mother, aunt or uncle, absorbed in the volumes as the children. Everybody wants to know, but nobody wants to be told in a prosy and uninteresting manner. The world of knowledge is also the world of romance, and when the two things can be brought together, as in this remarkable work, there is not a man, woman or child who can fail to be interested, or fail to find out.

OPERA AND HORSE SHOW BRING OUT NEW FASHIONS

TWO of the most important events in smart society happened during the past week and both on the same night. One was the opening of the opera season and the other the opening night of the annual Horse Show, this time given under the auspices of the Red Cross. These two occasions put the final seal on the fate of fashions.

"Brilliant" is the word that always is used to describe the first night at the opera. Last Monday, from the time the first evening coat made its appearance, until the last evening coat had disappeared into the homeward-bound limousine, the scene was a flash of color. Reports have said, "Opera not so brilliant as in other years," or words to that effect. It was a different sort of color—that was all. This season the colors are not crude. They are pastel shades and a great deal of black and white was worn. Here and there was seen a dashing note of cerise or flame colors—just enough to accent the dominant note of lighter, paler colors.

The evening wraps at the opera were more gorgeous and sumptuous than ever. And the fashion of cutting an evening wrap out of a great deal of material, draped or hung perfectly straight, is calculated to exhibit the lovely materials to the best advantage. Metal brocades were seen in great numbers. Wraps of fur were wonderful to behold. There were even embroidered velvets and Chinese Mandarin coats had not been in any wise neglected.

In the boxes one noticed that the evening gowns followed all predictions and kept to straight and simple designs and lines. More often than not the gowns were draped of velvets and satins, with bodices made partly or entirely of cloth of gold, handsome brocade, or lace with chiffon and tulle. White satin gowns were noticeable.

Gold and Blue Brocade Evening Gown Seen at the Opera.

Typical Horse Show Toggery.

At the Horse Show the women who were looking on seemed far more absorbed in the business at hand than in the part that they and their clothes were playing in the general scheme of things. From one angle this fact made them all the more charming. They seemed to have forgotten that they were beautiful, thereby achieving a much more elevated effect of beauty. When one came to examine the clothes and their appurtenances one found some beautiful things.

It was cold in Madison Square Garden on that first night of the Horse Show, which made many of the women hold their wraps close to them, hiding any glimpse of the glories of their gowns. However, their wraps were most interesting in themselves, and when a gown did appear between the enfolding coats it was usually a beautiful one.

The débutantes who sold programs for the benefit of the Red Cross saw fit to cover their frocks with large white badges and aprons, while their coiffures were entirely submerged under Red Cross caps. One wished to see a little more frock and a little less apron. They wore, as a rule, one-piece dresses with meagre spots of trimming, depending upon their rich materials—usually velvets and velours—for their distinction.

From these two gatherings of smart society, assembled for the first time this Winter certain conclusions may be drawn with regard to fashion. Here is a list of the points that were noted as being established good style for Winter, and as pointing toward what will be generally accepted for Spring:

Suits without trimming are very chic. They are made with either three-quarter length coats or with very short, perky coats, the material being broadcloth or wool velours or some similar fabric. So far, before the cold days are upon us, they are worn without extra fur pieces. The supposition is that, as Winter winds grow more and more severe, they will be supplemented by top coats rather than by furs. There is something distinguished about a well-tailored suit entirely without fur in a season when there is so much fur of every sort.

Evening gowns are best when they have no trimming at all or when they are trimmed with only a touch of embroidery or contrasting color in one way or another. Velvets and brocades are the chosen materials, though a large sprinkling of satins is evident.

Dark, rich colors are best for street wear. Terra cotta, Pekin blue, brown in all of its tones, and shades of green are the most popular.

When low necks are used, either on afternoon or on evening dresses, the V line is the best. It is usually finished straight and hard, with no contrasting edging on daytime things or with a row of darkish braid or folded silk.

White collars in the old-fashioned sense are taboo. When one is used it is a tiny, dainty affair of expensive lace or finely hemstitched organdy, often combined with a little oddly shaped yoke.

Flowing sleeves of chiffon or Georgette crêpe are often a part of an afternoon or an evening gown. Indeed, chiffon is apt to flow from any portion of a well designed gown. It has a strikingly feminine air.

Short coats of fur—short-haired fur—are prominent these days. Their line of ending is somewhere at the hips or below the hips, according to the height and stature of the wearers. They are loose and boxed in character, with wide and ample sleeves. One of squirrel was seen, worn with a red velours gown and a wide black picture hat.

Gowns of transparent materials—of Georgette crêpe and chiffon—are not nearly so popular this season as they have been. There is a decided breaking away from the filmy mode of dressing. Good, serviceable cloths are much better economy, and have come lately to be much better style, which is well on account of the war and advancing prices.

Hats have taken unto themselves the general prevailing idea of simplicity, and, save for ostrich feathers, which, when they appear, usually make the whole hat, are plain in line and void of any elaborate trimming. Often blocked silk hats are seen with dressy clothes, and they have a way of making a charming face look just a shade more charming. Brocaded toques of military line are noticeable, and there are the ever-present picture hats, often mushroom in shape, and artistically irregular.

Fur collars and cuffs are distinctly different from those of other years. The collars—the best of them—are shawl in cut and not too wide. The cuffs are wide and straight. There is a collar called the coachman's collar, which stands high about the neck and head. It is lovely in effect, but only a certain type can carry it off, which makes it not universally popular or becoming.

No muffs are visible as yet. Fur coats are the thing.

The blouses worn with suits cannot be said to be alike in any one particular; some are high at the neck, plain and severe; while others are low and soft and gently becoming. One high-necked blouse was made of sage green crepe de chine. It had a high collar and straight cuffs of black satin ribbon, with just a fold of something white at the line where the black touched the skin.

Velvet is much worn for both afternoon and evening; also for coats and suits.

Black evening gowns are many. They are made of satin and net or of some other material, with jet; or they are made of velvet, severely plain.

Shoes have taken a decided turn toward the Oxford variety. With the daytime dress which has come to be a part of every woman's wardrobe, Oxfords of dark brown leather are considered smart. They have low heels and are worn with dark brown stockings. Patent leather Oxfords were seen with a velvet afternoon frock. Spats with pumps are worn by many women, and there are a few brown shoes with lighter suede tops. For evening, slippers made of cloth of silver or gold were more generally worn than anything else.

A Scotch cap made of black with a bright red band about it was worn by a tiny maiden along with a biscuit-colored, short jacketed coat and a sealskin shoulder cape.

Sashes there are in profusion. Many are parts of the dresses. Some are made of ribbon; others are crushed of satin and brocade.

Some of the newer suits have short jackets, the peplums being very full, cut circular, so that they perk out behind. This seems to be a good indication for Spring suits, which, first reports say, are to have short jackets.

Duvetyn hats are worn by those who do the proper thing. One of tan, stitched to give it body, was made in turban shape and edged with narrow bands of moleskin. It was worn with a black satin dress.

A red wool cashmere dress had no trimming at all except a three-inch crocheted belt of red and green and black in stripes. Even the neckline was finished plain.

A black velvet dress was worn with a broad black velvet hat and a long, loose cape of black wool velours. The only color about the whole was the lining of the cape in aviator blue.

Russian sable continues to be the most beautiful fur worn. One or two wraps of chinchilla were seen.

Shopping bags, evolved from the knitting bag and gaining in the evolution not so much bulk but a great deal of roominess, are made of dark-colored chiffon velvet and lined with lustrous silks. Some are made of fur, and a number had fur trimmings on velvet, brocade, or satin.

Jewels are not very much in evidence. They are selling very well this year, it is said, but they are certainly being worn with more discretion than ever before.

Sport suits are usually made of heather mixtures in pale greens, pinks, blues, and yellows. They are cut on severely tailored lines with narrow skirts.

The topcoats worn by women riding at the Horse Show were of soft woolen materials, cut on mannish lines, made rather short, and full at the hem. The sleeves were either raglan or set into elongated armholes. One English tweed cape was worn in the ring.

Riding habits showed nothing new. They were, both for side saddle and riding astride, of black broadcloth or cheviot. Some of the hats were of derby shape, but most of them were of silk beaver blocked.

CENSUS OF PHYSICIANS URGED

MANY important and authoritative medical publications with large circulations throughout the United States are properly concerned about the duty of the medical profession in time of war. The Medical Record of this city discusses the subject editorially, advocating the so-called "New York idea" as a solution of the problem, and offers these comments:

"It is a difficult problem that confronts many physicians at the present time, pulled, as some are, by duty in three directions. In the first place, is the loud and insistent call of patriotism, which seems to be—the country needs you! Then there is the call of the community—your patients need you! And finally there is the domestic call—your wife, your children, or may be your aged parents, need you!

"The country calls with loud voice and imperatively; the army needs medical officers, and it must and will have them. But it does not need every man; unless the war is prolonged far beyond the conservative estimate of those best qualified to guess, the number of physicians to be taken from civil life will not exceed 25,000, or about 17 per cent. of the registered physicians of the country—say one in six of the total.

"But the problem of choice remains, and it is here that what has been called the New York idea offers a solution. This is the plan recommended by the Medical Section of the New York State Committee of National Defense.

"We do not quite like the term selective draft; mass volunteering is better and more truly expresses the plan that would secure the needed quota of available medical men. As we have said before, we do not believe conscription will be necessary, but what is necessary—absolutely necessary to prevent suffering and injustice, is to determine who among the 140,000 or more physicians of the country should go and who should stay. This selection can best be made by a medical census such as that of New York State, the profession as a whole offering itself to the service of its country, some of its members to go to the war, some to remain in civil practice, some to retain their teaching positions, and others to stay at home perforce because of age or physical incapacity."

ECONOMY IN DRESS.

Have You Got a "Dress Card" Yet?

How to dress smartly and yet economically interests women now more than ever. Economy is the watchword of the day, and now the ladies of the National Committee for Dress Economy have tackled successfully the problem of the high cost of smart dressing. It is no longer necessary to pay the full retail prices for your gowns, wraps, hats, etc. At the office of the local Secretary of the committee, Aeolian Hall, 33 West 42d St., Suite 1544, one may obtain an "economy card" free. This card will entitle you to substantial cash discounts on your purchases at the very smartest of New York's specialty shops. Make your selections at regular prices, and then, by producing your "dress card," you can settle your bill at the discount arranged with the committee. All the leading smart shops in the city are offered the opportunity to cooperate with the committee.

Furniture Of Enduring Charm

Of particular interest at this season are the many small articles of charming character available at no prohibitive cost in the interesting Galleries of this establishment, for two-score years devoted exclusively to Furniture and Decorative Objects.

¶ In almost every instance there are no duplicates — each article having its own peculiar appeal either for one's personal use or as a thoughtful remembrance at the approaching Yuletide.

¶ With the latter in mind, one's attention is arrested by the exquisite examples of inlay and lacquer, such as graceful "occasional" Tables and Chairs, Consoles, Book Stands, Writing Tables and Mirrors—suitable alike for the living room and boudoir. Quite as irresistible in their charm are the beautiful Screens, the faithfully wrought Florentine Banquettes, the unusual Lamps, Torcheres and Candelabra, the host of unique accessories for the table and desk.

¶ The collection is equally rich in pieces of more pretentious character—imposing Hall Clocks, Secretaries and Cabinets, richly carved Tables and Settees for the living room and library, luxuriously upholstered Sofas and Chairs, as well as complete groups for the Dining Room and Chamber. In addition there is a profusion of both modern and ancient Oriental Rugs of all sizes.

¶ Suggestions may be gained from de luxe prints of well-appointed interiors, sent gratis upon request.

SOCIETY IN WAR RELIEF WORK

WITH the first week of the formal Winter season over, society seems to have a surer grasp on things. The week was a representative one, with the first night of the opera, the Horse Show, and fashionable weddings. These events were all as interesting as in days of peace. War has simply dimmed the blaze of jewels at the opera, just as the Fuel Administrator has darkened Broadway, but nothing has been made sombre. The weddings were just as smart, although slightly simplified by war.

The great gap in the early season will now be felt, for within the last five years this period of the Winter season, until the holidays, has practically been given over to the débutantes. There are many débutantes of this year, to be sure, but they are only spoken of as débutantes, and are launched without any fuss or feathers. Appearing for the first time in the boxes at the opera and the Horse Show seems to have been the only heralding note of presentation so far.

Gifts by the score are being presented quietly at teas and the usual informal afternoon affairs in many of the larger cities, where tradition and patriotism is unquestioned, and some people in New York, who have hitherto taken great delight in entertaining the buds, feel that perhaps a too drastic line has been drawn appertaining to the New York girls, who should be allowed, they claim, to have a little fling in spite of the war.

Society is dancing in Washington, although the supper has been eliminated in some instances. It is quite probable that mourning will be dispensed with, and stars of gold substituted, signifying the glory of heroism rather than the sting of death on the battlefield. Thus the tendency of society as a whole will be to keep things going, to smile bravely, and to dispense with the gloom.

Many are hoping that announcements of informal home affairs for the débutantes will soon be forthcoming, so that the girl, eager for some sort of recognition that is due her by the right of time-honored tradition, may not be entirely overlooked. There is a scarcity of young men, but society is versatile, and should find a substitute for the tea dances of bygone days. Knitting is meeting the necessity of the hour and can hardly be called a fad, but the grandmothers of many of the débutantes of this season spent some of the happiest hours of their life at knitting and quilting bees. Skating also offers a proper field for débutante parties, for nearly every one skates now.

In former seasons women were conspicuous in the parterre row at the opera by reason of their jewels. During the week they stood out more prominently through lack of them. Several diamond tiaras were noticed at the opening, affording an occasional flare. Pearls, wonderful strings of them, were worn, and they seem to be the most suitable wartime bauble.

Diamonds are not taboo by any means, for they were used largely at the Horse Show, but so arranged as to be partially hidden by laces, furs and wraps. The long strand of diamonds seems most in vogue for the old as well as for the younger set, for they are not flashy. Turquoises, rubies, emeralds and sapphires are being much worn by fashionable women. Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, at the opera opening, wore a striking wing-shaped headdress of turquoises. At the first night of the Horse Show Mrs. E. H. Harriman wore a huge ruby.

A picturesque feature of all big social assemblies now is the cosmopolitanism of the throng, brought about by the war, for men and women of high rank from all the allied countries, the former often in their snappy uniforms of service, and eminent artists and authors, too, are sojourning in our midst. Princes and Princesses, dukes and duchesses, lords and ladies rub elbows with our millionaires in the most democratic manner. The effect can hardly be called cosmopolitan after all, for it is democracy coming true, for which the world is being made safe.

New York society has never been so democratic, and the proof of the democratic spirit that prevails will be strongly evidenced at the coming war relief spectacle, to be staged next Saturday for nineteen days at the Grand Central Palace, when the foremost women of the great bulwark of general society, without respect to money or creed, will work together for allied humanity.

HERO LAND will be society's rendezvous for days, and in the matter of entertainment it will resemble somewhat a bit of the gay Winter season before war began to tear the world to pieces, compressed into tabloid form. In addition to this, the general public will add to the interest, and not only look on but take part. Its patronage has been long assured and naught remains now but the rising of the curtain on Saturday.

The names of those identified with the bazaar would fill a book, and all that is going to happen would make a sequel. Here are a few gleanings of what is really to be:

In the Red Cross tea room the Junior League girls are to be the waitresses and will wear uniforms of white with a touch of red and blue, designed by Mrs. Schenck, the former Miss Civilise Alexandre.

Mrs. Lydig Hoyt Will Be Identified with the American Godmothers' League at Hero Land.

At the Canadian Log Cabin, over which Mrs. Frank Duff Frazier of Montreal is to preside, and which will be under the patronage of the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire, many beautiful furs from the North will be shown.

The National League for Women's Service will show the preparation of canteen rations and how army dispatches are sent in speed. In conjunction with the American Fund for French Wounded and the Vacation War Relief Association, the league will have charge of that part of the show which will be a reproduction of France as it was and as it is today after the Huns got at it. Mrs. Nelson Henry is Chairman of the league's committee.

There will be a universal market at which everything from a hairpin to a plow will be sold.

The Golden West cabaret promises to be quite the liveliest of all the attractions, with a dance hall and cowboys, just like the motion-picture shows.

The Cheshire Cheese of London is to be reproduced with great exactness to detail and Mrs. James W. Gerard is to be in charge.

A beauty shop and fortune-telling booth will be run by Mrs. Gertrude Atherton and others, in the interest of a noted French war relief, Le Bien-Etre du Blessé.

The Blue Cross is to show dogs and sell a picture painted by Miss Agnes E. Mayer entitled "Let Me Help." The American Fund for French Wounded will present a mediaeval French street, and all the women and girls taking part will appear in costume. The Stage Women's War Relief is to stage a program of entertainment, with all the stars of theatredom appearing on various nights.

An old English street has been planned by the British War Relief Association. Miss Carolyn Wells is to publish a daily newspaper for this relief. It will be called "The Nobody Home Journal." A real lighthouse is to be a conspicuous feature of the booth run by the Committee for Men Blinded in Battle. The Lafayette Fund is to have all sorts of Christmas gifts on sale. Paul Chaffin will reproduce a street in New York, of the year 1680, with Mrs. Benjamin Guggenheim in charge of the booth.

THE weddings of mid-November have taken a decided drop after a notable increase, which reached its height last Wednesday. Very few are scheduled for this week so far.

On Saturday Miss Renée du Pont, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. T. Coleman du Pont of 11 East Sixty-eighth Street, will be married to John Wilcox Doualdson of this city, in Trinity Episcopal Church at Wilmington, Del.

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander S. Thweatt announce the marriage of their daughter, Miss Nancy Ruth Thweatt, to Gerald B. Fennell of Atlanta, Ga., which took place on Nov. 13.

The marriage of Miss Helen Warner Johns, daughter of Mrs. Henry Ward Johns of Lawrence Park, Bronxville, and Lucian Swift Kirtland of New York and Minneapolis, was celebrated on Thursday in Christ Church, Bronxville. Mrs. Johns gave her daughter in marriage. The bride is a daughter of the late H. W. Johns, the founder of the asbestos industry. She was educated in Paris, and has lived much abroad. Mr. Kirtland is a Yale man, and as his work will take him to France he and his bride will spend the Winter there.

Announcement of the marriage of Mrs. Ferdinand Blumenthal, formerly of New York, and the Duke of Montmorency, which was solemnized in Paris quietly on Thursday, was received here by her son, Cecil Blumenthal, and her two brothers, Joseph S. Ulman and J. Stevens Ulman, all of this city. Captain Talleyrand-Perigord, as the Duke was known before he came into his title after the death of his father several years ago, is on the General Staff of the French Army. The bride's first husband was a well-known merchant of New York, and died three years ago on the high seas while en route from Italy to this port.

The marriage of Miss Margaret Winslow and R. Gerden Williams of Baltimore is to take place the first week in December at St. Thomas, West Indies. As Mr. Williams is a Paymaster in the United States Navy he was unable to get leave of absence. Miss Winslow is sailing on Nov. 28 for St. Thomas with her mother and father. Her marriage will be the first one of interest to New York society to take place on the Virgin Islands, acquired recently by the Government from the Danish.

ENGAGEMENTS keep up at a lively rate, and several of interest have just been announced.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Martyn Alexander of 15 East Thirty-sixth Street have told of the betrothal of their daughter, Miss Helen Gertrude Alexander, to Philip Kip Rhinelander, son of Philip Rhinelander of 18 West Forty-eighth Street.

Miss Alexander was introduced to society two seasons ago, and took part in the Junior League entertainment of that year as well as other entertainments held since for charity. Mr. Rhinelander is a Harvard graduate, and is now a Lieutenant in the 107th Infantry, which was the 7th Regiment, N. G. N. Y., being stationed at Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg, S. C.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward W. Gould of Staten Island have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Harriet Louise Gould, to David Allen Newell, son of Mrs. William A. Newell of Brookline, Mass. Mr. Gould is a member of the New York Stock Exchange.

Mrs. William C. Allison of Rosemont, Penn., and Bar Harbor, Me., has announced her engagement to Charles Stockton Thorne of 471 Park Avenue, this city. Mrs. Allison is the widow of William C. Allison of Philadelphia, who died in 1911. She has a son, Ronald Allison, who has recently been accepted in the British Royal Flying Corps for service abroad as an aviator. Mr. Thorne is the son of the late Rev. and Mrs. William H. Thorne. On the maternal side he is descended from John Stockton, an Englishman, who settled in Flushing, L. I., about 1656. Mr. Thorne is prominent in coal and marine shipping circles of this city and Virginia, and belongs to the New York Yacht, Automobile, Sleepy Hollow, Ardsley, and Knollwood Golf Clubs.

DIVERSITY marks the activities of society, and many novelties in entertaining are bound to spring up before the season is very old.

Ice skating tops the list for popular indoor sports. George J. Gould is a keen follower of the sport, and to become proficient in figure skating he has leased the St. Nicholas ice rink for an hour a day, five days out of the week, for the next six months.

On Thursday afternoon the Ice Palace Skating Club held its first meeting at the rink at 181st Street. The club will hold sessions there every morning and afternoon except Saturday and Sunday for the season, and has 150 members. While its chief object is recreation, it undoubtedly will increase interest in figure skating. The Advisory Committee is made up of Dr. James W. Decker, Henry W. Howe, Louis Livingston, Maurice Roche, F. Louis Slade, S. Bryce Wing, and Robert D. Wrenn.

Among the patronesses of the club are Mrs. Henry Worthington Bull, Mrs. Irving Brokaw, Mrs. Frederic Foster, Mrs. J. Horace Harding, Mrs. Garrett Kip, Mrs. Edward S. Knapp, Mrs. Charles Morgan, Mrs. Clarence C. Pell, Mrs. Fuller Potter, Mrs. Herbert L. Pratt, Mrs. Samuel Sloan, Mrs. Joseph R. Swan, and Mrs. Barger Wallach.

An interesting conference is to be held at the home of Mrs. Lyman B. Kendall, 520 Park Avenue, tomorrow evening, under the auspices of the Committee For the Care of French Mothers and Children. Bishop Courtney is to preside, and Miss Gretchen Morris, soprano, will appear in a selection of songs. The Rev. Dr. Henri Anet of Brussels will speak on the devastation of France and Belgium, having recently returned from those regions, and will illustrate his talk by lantern slides.

Mrs. Pulitzer has donated a room at her home, 7 East Seventy-third Street, for the use of the Rainbow Division Workers' Committee, an auxiliary of the New York Chapter of the American Red Cross, which supplies knitted articles for the army. Mrs. George R. Dyer is Chairman of the organization, and Mrs. Nelson B. Burr Secretary. Mrs. Herbert Harriman, Mrs. Winthrop Ames, and Mrs. Mortimer L. Schiff are numbered among the active members.

The date has been announced for the only dance which the New Assemblies will hold this Winter, the series having been abandoned owing to the war. This will take place on Dec. 7 at Delmonico's, and will be for the benefit of the Navy Relief Society and the Military Entertainment Committee of the Navy. Mrs. Wendell C. Phillips of 40 West Forty-seventh Street is receiving applications for tickets at $5 each, which includes supper.

Mrs. William Sherman Scott and her daughter, who have been in the Ambulance Hospital in Paris the last six months, have returned for rest, and are at present at Warren, R. I.

On Wednesday at noon Major Dan Coffin and Captain Richard Haigh of the British Army will talk in the ballroom at Sherry's on their personal war experiences. Both are on this side recovering from gassing. The affair is for the benefit of the Christmas Fund of the American Godmothers' League for the American soldiers in France, of which Mrs. William Leonard Davis is Chairman. Mrs. F. Franklin Bell, Mrs. John M. Bowers, Mrs. Adolf Ladenburg, Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. Charles Van Rensselaer, and Mrs. W. Fitzhugh Whitehouse are numbered among the patronesses.

WOMAN FARMER TALKS OF HER WORK

MISS LAURA CLAY of Lexington, Ky., practical blue-grass farmer and veteran suffragist, who was in New York recently, has a new point of view on the food question and the part to be played by farm women. It is because the farm women leave to take unskilled positions in town that the men follow, she says. The farm women leave because, as they grow up, their fathers are not able to support them. The women do not know enough of the lighter kinds of farm work that they might do to support themselves. So the farms are deserted, the food production falls off, and high prices result.

"One thing we are going to get out of this war," said Miss Clay, "is the education of women in canning, preserving, and the care of poultry and gardens. I wouldn't like to see our women go into the fields on equal terms with men, as women do in Europe, but there are plenty of things that they can do. With intensive farming there is no limit to what the ground will produce. A woman with a family can't do much in general farming lines, but the daughters in the family can easily do enough work to pay for their clothes, which the father cannot afford to buy. He can feed them, he can house them, but now that spinning and weaving and making the materials have been taken away from them the women are not self-supporting.

"It is the need of clothes that takes the women away from home in the country. Very little would supply this—$1 a week, I think. When the girls learn, as they are beginning to do now, to raise salable products, they will not seek the cities. The pressure in the towns and in the ranks of unskilled labor will be relieved, the farm girls will not get town notions, and the men will stay at home and marry them."

Miss Clay has been a practical farmer since she was a young girl. Her farm of 285 acres was entailed and comes to her from her grandfather, Green Clay, who was the first white man on the land when he went to Kentucky from Virginia in 1776. Green Clay was the gallant soldier who in 1813 led a force of 3,000 to relieve General Harrison, besieged by the British and Indians at Fort Meigs. He was a cousin of Henry Clay and father of the late Cassius Marcellus Clay, father of Miss Clay.

"It does not mean anything for a woman to be a farmer in my part of the country," she continued, "for many women do it, and they do it quite as well as the man. When a woman inherits a farm, she carries it on. A woman who is left a widow takes up the work her husband was doing and gets along as well as he did, if not better. I myself don't do the real farm work, but I know all about it and direct every part of it. Mine is one of the blue-grass grazing farms, and I keep as much of it in blue grass as I can. This year I have raised more crops because of the call of the war. I put in my wheat myself, but corn I have done on shares. That is the way of a great many people in my part of the country.

"I keep about thirty head of cattle, but I buy these and sell them again. If I raised them, it would mean dairying, and I would have to stay and look after the work and couldn't go off and make suffrage speeches. I suppose I would make more money if I stayed all the time and looked after the farm. There is no man I could have to work on it, no matter how good he is, whose method I could not improve if I followed him. I am sure of that.

"At present I am interested in this question of food and getting the women to the farm again. I am sure that the high cost of food merely means we are not raising enough. They talk about the middleman, but that is not the main question. I heard your State Commissioner of Foods and Markets, John J. Dillon, speak the other day, and he said that in 1880 70 per cent. of the community was engaged in raising food for the remaining 30 per cent. of consumers, and that the ratio was now almost reversed, the 30 per cent. raising food for the 70 per cent. of consumers. That is a tremendous change.

"We are beginning to see the influence of the war on the work of the women. The Smith-Lever bill is going to accomplish a great deal. There is much work women can do on a farm with perfect propriety, and, as they are being educated for the work, the feeling about it is changing. There must be more community spirit, a change of social ideas as well as customs. With the increased use of farm machinery the possibility of women's work is increasing."

WILL ITALIANS FALL BACK FROM THE PIAVE TO THE ADIGE?

Despite Successful Resistance on the Former River It Is Less Advantageous as a Defensive Line Than the Latter—Brilliant Successes of the British Under General Allenby in Palestine.

By a Military Expert.

Copyright, 1917, by The New York Times Company.

THE German Army has had a strange history in the great war, the strangest being exhibited by a tendency to break down just as it appears inevitable that the fruits of a great victory are about to be gathered. No force has been better able to deliver a single overwhelming blow, producing a truly devastating effect, than have the Germans. No army has shown a greater ability to follow up an initial success and turn it into the semblance of victory. The German Army has proved itself to be the most capable machine in Europe in the matter of covering ground in following up a retreating enemy. Yet, in practically every case, this army has in the end been halted and beaten to a standstill before decisive results could be obtained.

In the beginning of the war there was the classic example of the campaign against the French which terminated in the battle of the Marne. Although German critics refer to the Marne as a strategic retreat, those of the Allies prefer to call it by its true name, a German defeat. Against Russia there was the same outcome. Successful along the Dunajec, the Germans made one of the most rapid advances in history in following up the retreating Russians. Russia was demoralized, outgunned, and outmunitioned. And yet when the crucial point was reached, when the Germans arrived before Dvinsk and the Dwina River, their ability to strike seemed to disappear even before the disorganized Russians, and what appeared to be a truly great victory was turned into another check.

The Serbian campaign, which came next in order, was a complete success, the only complete thing the Germans have accomplished. But when the German force was sent against Rumania we had a duplication of the Russian incident. Rumania was cut in half, almost destroyed. The Russian left wing was all but thrown open to attack and the gateway to lower Bessarabia and to both the grain belts and the iron fields of Russia just about to be entered. But, along the line of the Danube and the Sereth, the Germans were held fast and another victory was snatched from their hands.

And now we come to the Italian fighting. Will history repeat itself? Will the Italians, when they have reached the line on which they are going to make their stand, hold the Germans back and produce another deadlock? It is, of course, too early to say. We do not know just where the Italians will make this stand. Apparently it will be at the Piave, where they are now. As a matter of fact, it may be still further to the rear—at the Brenta or the Adige. Nevertheless, the German machine has been growing slower and slower as it has advanced. The first check was at the Tagliamento, where, because of river floods, they were detained for several days. At the Livenza, a much smaller stream, there was a similar delay. And now before the Piave there has been a hold-up for the better part of a week. Several severe attacks have been made in an effort to force a crossing. Small forces have indeed succeeded in reaching the western side, one near the village of Grisolera. But before it are only the marshes which protect Venice from the north, so that the crossing means but little.

The crossing of a river by a small portion of an army at a single point has but little significance. It does not make the river position untenable or in any way affect its security. To break such a position it is necessary to cross either on a wide front or in sufficient numbers to be able to spread out after crossing, and this the Germans have not done, so far as the lower Piave is concerned.

Further north, however, in the centre of the great bend of the Piave, the Germans have crossed in force and are in complete control of the western bank. The crossing was made at Feltre, which, combined with the flanking operation from the north, which began with the capture of Belluno, cleared the Italians from the river line.

The Piave, because of this bend, is not a particularly strong defensive line. It is easily flanked north of the bend by an attack through the mountains. Once the northern part of the bend has been crossed in force, the success of the defense of the lower river depends entirely upon the ability of the defenders to guard the routes from Feltre and the Val Sugana toward the south. If these routes can be held the southern line is safe.

What we are witnessing now is probably a delay on both sides for practically the same purposes. The German advance was very rapid and the heavy artillery had a hard and rough road to travel. Germany must wait until it can come up and get into position. In the meantime the Teutons are evidently feeling out various sections of the Italian line between the Piave bend and the mouth of the river with a view to finding a weak spot in the defense. The Italians are holding in order to delay the advance as much as possible, so that the reinforcements which the British and the French are sending may have time to arrive.

General Frederick B. Maurice of the British Army has intimated that the British are not going to send any reinforcements to the Piave line. If this is really the case, the statement contains great significance. It means that the line of the Piave is not the line which has been determined upon as the main line of the Italian defense. If it were, both British and French would be sending up to it all available strength. That they are not doing so indicates that this strength is being concentrated somewhere in the rear of the present Italian line, either along the Brenta or along the Adige, preparing to protect the Italian crossing and check the Germanic invasion at the river selected.

The Italians, of course, will hold the Piave as long as it is possible to do so. If they give evidence of having positions sufficiently strong, the plan may be changed. But it is not clear how the Italians can hold the line of the Brenta with any greater security than they already have on the Piave. If the Piave is weak because of the great bend at Feltre, the Brenta is just as weak because of the bend west of Feltre and north of Bassano.

In addition to the matter of delay there is the probability that the Germans do not intend to try to force the passage of the Piave. Although they have made several attempts to feel out the Italian line the movement along the river may be simply a holding movement to keep whatever Italian troops are engaged in blocking the river crossings from moving elsewhere while the main attack is to come from the north, taking the river in flank. By this means the Italians may be forced from their defensive positions much more rapidly and at much less cost than by a frontal attack. The Germans are exerting their greatest pressure between Asiago and the Piave. Their positions on the Asiago Plateau are secure from any flanking movement such as drove the Austrians back in 1916. They have nothing whatever to fear from this flank. Pivoting, then, on Asiago, the Germans are steadily pushing their way southward on a line parallel with the line of the Treviso-Verona railroad. As they move forward, the Italians along the Piave are compelled to relinquish their positions, so that little by little the entire Piave may be cleared.

On Friday afternoon, the Germans reported that they had occupied Cismon, a village on the Brenta, only nine miles from the point where the river comes out into the northern plain and eleven miles from Bassano. Along the Piave, the Germans have pushed down through the mountains to within four miles of the plain. When Bassano is placed in danger by the German approach the line of the Piave must be given up, at least as far south as Treviso, because the only means of reaching this part of the Piave with supplies is by the railroad from Bassano to Montebelluna.

Another point in the direction of the German pressure is its effect on the line of the Brenta. As the Germans move southward from Asiago to the east, the line of the Brenta is affected just as seriously as is the Piave. For this reason it is doubtful whether the German efforts against the Piave line are more than feints, since, if both rivers can be cleared by the same blow from the north, it would seem to be economy in men and time to act against them simultaneously rather than by trying to force the passage, first of one and then of the other, by two independent attacks.

The principal element in all this theatre at the present time is the railroad from Verona through Vicenza to Treviso. This is the only supply line that the Italians have; it is not only important, but an absolute necessity. The Germans are still about twenty miles from it, but once they get to the plains in their movement from the north they should be able to reach it with but little delay.

It is becoming more evident that the Piave is not the main line of Italian defense. This being the case, the statement of General Maurice, to which reference has been made, is readily interpreted. The probabilities are that we shall witness a continued retreat on the part of the Italians until the line of the Adige is reached. This is the shortest line the Italians can take up and will probably be the strongest. It, too, has the disadvantage, however, that it may be flanked by an attack along the Val di Sole through Tonale Pass. In fact, this section of the Italian frontier is filled with vital points, the failure of any one of which may bring dire consequences. For this reason, every invasion which Italy has ever suffered up to the present time has been through the Trentino by way of the passes which open out eventually into the plain of Northern Italy.

While no one can foretell what even a few days may bring forth, one thing is reasonably certain—the end of the Italian retreat is not yet in sight. The Germans are constantly augmenting the force with which they first struck the Italian defense, and the probabilities are that this augmentation is finding its way not into the plains against the river positions but in the mountains through which the river positions can be flanked. It is then from the north rather than from the east that the greatest danger is to come.

The Italian situation this week was supplemented by the apparent success of the Bolsheviki element in Russia and the offer by this element to Germany of an armistice as a forerunner to a separate peace. Both the Russian crisis and the Italian retreat vastly increase the work which is imposed upon the other Allies and in particular the work of the military forces of the United States. The front in France and that in Italy will be one front on which will be concentrated the full military strength of Germany combined with what is left of Austria. In other words, in so far as the effect on the war is concerned, it will be as if the German Army, which we have seen gradually dwindling, had suddenly been increased by two million men. England and France have given all they have in man power, and while England may be rightly said to be at the height of the wave, France has passed that point and is declining. The army of the United States will then have to close the gap and, in order to restore the balance as it was on the first of this year, will have to send to Europe a number of men at least equal to the strength which the withdrawal of Russia has placed at the disposal of the Germans in the west.

On the western front the military activity has been somewhat overshadowed by the controversy in England over the proposed concentration of power in a general staff. English politics, which are undoubtedly influencing the situation somewhat one way or the other, are not within the scope of this article. But there are certain military features affecting the situation which may properly be commented upon.

If there is to be such a body of men to control the military operations and direct the strategy of the war, there is one fundamental requisite to be filled if disaster is to be avoided. It must be composed of military men, of the greatest strategists of which the various countries represented can boast. The history of other wars is replete with examples of the folly of civilians and amateur strategists attempting to direct the operations in the field. This was true even when there were military advisers to counsel the civilians. The most notable case, probably, was President Lincoln's effort to run the civil war with General Halleck as his adviser. The results were calamitous. Indeed, it was not until Grant was placed in command with full and unlimited authority that the first step was taken to defeat the Confederacy. This is but one isolated case out of a dozen or more which served to string the war out over the four years.

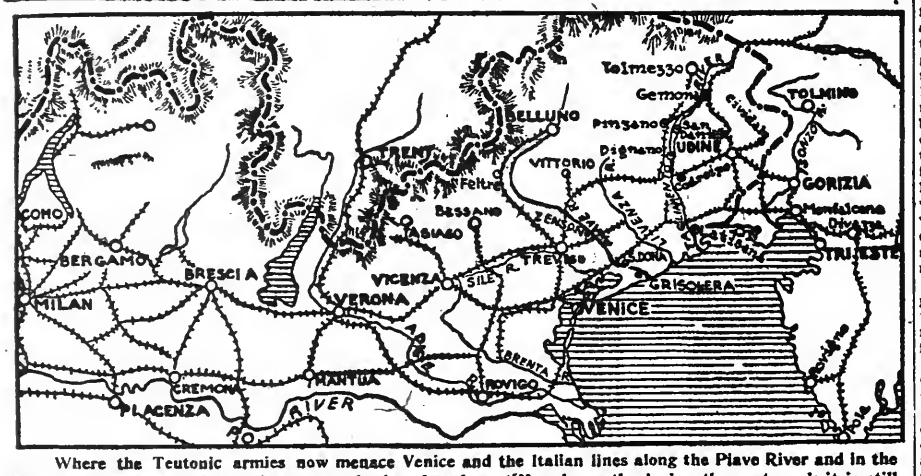
Moreover, it is useless to form such a staff if the power is not also given to conduct the war, as far as the military side of it is concerned, without interference from the civil side of the various Governments. If the military command is to be controlled in its decisions by the civilian body, the division of authority will produce nothing but confusion and, from a practical standpoint, will be exactly the same as if the entire staff was made up of representatives of the civil Government. A general staff of the ablest military men to be found, with unlimited power to conduct the military side of the war—this is what the situation demands in order that sacrifice may be minimized and victory assured in the shortest possible time.

Aside from this development, the military situation on the western front has undergone but little change. The Germans seem to have concentrated against the Passchendaele positions a much heavier mass of artillery, and during the week have been laying down a barrage fire almost as severe as that of the British themselves. General Haig may have had to weaken his front somewhat in order to alleviate the stress of the Italian situation and, accordingly, may not wish to attack until he has been strengthened.

In the Near East the British have been amazingly successful. In Mesopotamia they have indulged in heavy raids against the supply bases of the Turks north of Tekrit and in these operations have driven the Turks so far to the north that contact seems to have been lost. The presumption is that this move has been made to hamper the campaign of the Germans, who are supposed to be massing large forces of men and quantities of supplies at Aleppo preparatory to an attempt to drive the British back to the head of the Persian Gulf. This does not seem to be altogether reasonable, however. From Bagdad to Mosul is a much shorter distance than from Aleppo to Mosul. Moreover, the communications in the former case are much better, as the distance to be traveled overland is less. If, therefore, the British were to move up the Tigris to Mosul, the great Turkish base in this district, do what damage they could and capture what they could, they would be able, with such fortifications as they could construct, to make just as good a defense as at Bagdad.

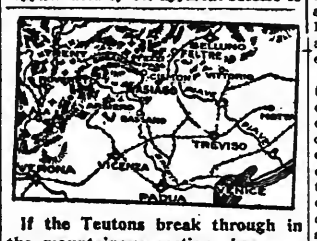
In Palestine the British have met with a series of brilliant successes. In fact, the British commanders in Asia, Generals Allenby and Maude, stand out as two of the greatest figures of the war. Operating under most difficult conditions, in a country where they were practically without communications and where supplies were necessarily scarce, they have, nevertheless, not suffered a single reverse. In Palestine the British have advanced to the very gates of Jerusalem and have occupied the Mediterranean port of Gaza, pushing up the coast almost to Jaffa. This latter is a most important point, being connected by rail with Jerusalem. With Jaffa in their hands, the British will have an excellent port from which to supply their troops without handling supplies all the way from Suez. The Turks seem to be totally demoralized and unable to stem the tide of the British advance at any point.

Here is another case of the effect of the Russian failure. If Russia were doing her part, the British and Russian forces in Mesopotamia would today be occupying Mosul; the Turks would be in flight toward the Taurus Mountains, while the British forces coming up through Palestine would threaten to cut them off before they could reach their refuge. There would be, in fact, every possibility of driving Turkey out of the war and opening the door to an invasion of Bulgaria from the east. As matters stand now, however, it does not seem that there is any great object to be accomplished in the Asiatic field. The war is rapidly being localized on the western front, and it is becoming more evident, as this centralization continues, that all efforts must be concentrated there. Saloniki and the Near East will have to abide by the decision in France, Flanders, and Italy.

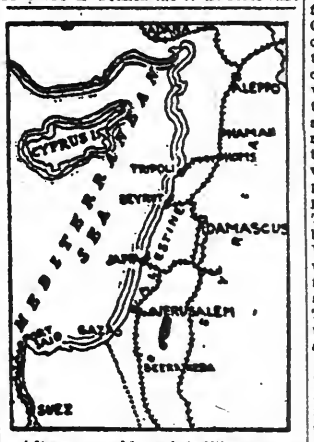


Where the Teutonic armies now menace Venice and the Italian lines along the Piave River and in the Trentino. Though Italian resistance to the invaders has stiffened greatly during the past week it is still a question whether the Piave has been chosen as the definite line of defense. Statements by General F. B. Maurice of the British Army and other military authorities seem to foreshadow a further Italian retreat, extending possibly to the Adige River.

The shaded area shows the low land about the mouth of the Piave River which Italian engineers are reported to have flooded, thus rendering precarious the position of Teutonic forces which succeeded in effecting a crossing.



If the Teutons break through in the mountainous section shown on this map, and reach Bassano, they will jeopardize the entire Italian line along the Piave River.



After a rapid and brilliant campaign British forces in Palestine, under General Allenby now menace Jaffa. It seems likely that Jerusalem will soon fall into their hands.

RECORDS OF ITALY'S THREE NEW GENERALS

Diaz, Giardina, and Badoglio Have Had Both Battlefield Experience and Highest Scientific Training.

THE triumvirate upon whom, as in Roman times of old, the task of coaxing victory to smile once more upon the Italian Army now devolves—Generals Diaz, Giardina, and Badoglio— is practically an unknown quantity outside of immediate army circles in Italy. In other words, the three Generals have never advertised or been advertised, but each of them has an excellent record.

All three belonged to the Stato Maggiore, or General Staff, which speaks of itself for their scientific training; all three have had actual battlefield experience, not only during the last two years on the Isonzo, but previously in the Italo-African wars. And all three are men in the prime of life—Badoglio in his forties, Diaz and Giardina in their fifties.

General Armando Diaz, whose name now appears under the official communiqués in place of that of Cadorna, has had a wide experience of all branches of the service. He belongs to the artillery, but has also had considerable infantry experience. He has been secretary to three chiefs of staff in succession—first to General Saletta, then to General Pollio, and finally to General Cadorna during the brief year of Cadorna's service in that capacity, just before Italy entered the war. For a time he was in charge of staff appointments, a thankless job at best, but where he put to his credit a reputation for impartial dealing and the knowledge of human values. As he had been a stern official in this bureaucratic capacity, he is said to be an inflexible disciplinarian in actual soldiering. But he works the iron rule on himself as well as on others. His record in the Libyan war is excellent, and his behaviour at Zanzur, where he was wounded, showed the stuff of which the man is made.

Characteristically cool and collected in the face of danger, well balanced and poised in the grind of the daily routine, General Diaz is a southerner, born and bred in Naples, and proves thus that in Italy balance and coolness are not exclusively and characteristically northern qualities, as people in this country are often led to believe. General Diaz is of medium build, of dark complexion and dark hair turning iron gray. He is very slightly cross-eyed, which, by the way, was held as a sign of good luck by the Latins of old, and so Americans may wish that the omen holds good.

General Giardina's name has been lately more in the public eye from a Parliamentary standpoint, as he was for some time Minister of War in the Boselli Cabinet. As soon as he left this office he asked to go back to the front, where the recent events found him and which evidently must have brought him creditably forward. He had served both as a Captain and a Major at the War Department in Rome in bureaucratic capacities, but the fighting spirit was in him.

The first Italo-African war, with the fight at Agordat, gave him a good chance to prove this and to make good the promises of his earlier youth, when he came out first from the difficult tests of the Scuola di Guerra. During the Libyan war he was appointed Chief of Staff by General Caneva, then in command of the Italian forces. He is a Northerner, and belongs to the Bersaglieri. His generous proportions, blonde coloring and mustache, and his well-rounded if somewhat florid speech, altogether combine in making him an impressive person to meet. Those who know him more intimately speak highly of his intellectual power and of his executive ability.

General Pietro Badoglio exemplifies among the three the Napoleonic type of rapid career—the one who has the real stuff in him, and at the same time the good luck that shoves him to the front in circumstances where he can best show it off.

Being only 46 years old he outranks now all of his companions and most of his masters. He is an artilleryman through and through, and has never been anything else, nor, it is said, would he care to be if he could. He also has African experience, and served under Generals Frugoni and Ragni. In fact, he earned his first promotion with signal praise for action on the battlefield at the first battle of Zanzur, that has been rated by military experts a model of "manoeuvred battle," having turned out actually as it had been planned on paper, chiefly on account of the clock-like working of the reserve force, its turning up in the proper places in the nick of time and so forth.

It is said that also in the present war General Badoglio has found himself more than once confronted by superior forces and in difficult circumstances, but always managed to get the best of the situation. One example in point is his brilliant behavior at the storming of Monte Santo. Another time on the Trentino front, having lost contact with headquarters, he took upon himself the responsibility of command and by his prompt determination and brilliant work saved the situation.

General Badoglio and General Diaz, having worked together, may confidently be expected to display team work. In personal appearance General Badoglio is of square and sturdy build, rather tall, with what the soldiers would call in barrack language, "a square mug." One eyebrow slightly raised gives him a curiously inquisitive and alert look. He is by birth a Piedmontese, but has long resided in Rome.

NOVEL CASES IN THE COURTS

COMMENTING on the recent decision of Supreme Court Justice Cropsey in Brooklyn in holding unconstitutional the statute of the last Legislature forbidding the sale of liquor within a certain distance of munition plants and other Government works, Law Notes says:

Whether a "dry zone" may be established by an executive or military order in war time presents an interesting question which has not yet been determined. Since necessity is the sole justification for martial law, a showing of some exigency would certainly be prerequisite. Thus in Herlihy v. Donohue, 59 Mont. 601, a militia commander acting under a proclamation of martial law at the scene of a labor riot, was held liable in damages for ordering the destruction of the stock of a saloon keeper who failed to obey an order for the closing of saloons. The closing order itself however, was apparently deemed to be valid, the court saying: "It is not pretended that the arrest and imprisonment of Herlihy and the closing of his place of business during the insurrection would not have been equally efficacious as a means of preventing drunkenness, disorder, or rioting. Under constitutional Government such as ours, the destruction of private property without compensation to the owner must be the last resort, available only in the presence of imminent and overwhelming necessity which brooks no delay." A similar holding has been made as to the destruction of liquor in time of war. McLaughlin v. Green, 50 Miss. 453. Lord Mansfield in Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 1 Cowp. 174, refers to a case in which a recovery was sustained against Admiral Boscawen, stationed off the coast of Nova Scotia, who pulled down some shanties in which sutlers sold liquor to the sailors. It is to be noted, however, that a subordinate officer is protected in obeying an order for the destruction of liquor. A Presidential order for the forcible establishment of a dry zone would therefore leave the liquor dealer in much the situation of the man whose attorney urged him through the bars of his cell that he could not be put in jail.

In a recently reported English decision the question arose in Morrison against Sheffield Corporation as to the liability of a local authority for an accident arising from the extinguishing of lights under a "lighting order" made under the Defense of the Realm act in consequence of threatened air raids. The plaintiff sued because he injured his eye on an iron spike forming part of a guard around a tree planted in a city street and contended that the accident would not have occurred had the streets been lighted. The city appealed from a judgment against it and took the ground that having erected a guard which was perfectly safe under normal circumstances, there was no duty on them to take steps to make it safe under the abnormal circumstances that arose in consequence of the lighting order. They pointed out that they had many miles of streets and hundreds of tree guards and other obstacles under their supervision, and it was an extremely heavy burden, if not an impossible task, to render them safe in the darkness, and that, too, at a few days' notice. How was it possible to make the streets safe in the circumstances? Luminous paint had been suggested as a remedy, but, according to their evidence, it was absolutely useless. The answer of the Court of Appeal was that the duty of local authorities was not only so to erect the tree guards as to be reasonably safe in normal circumstances, but there was also a continuing duty in all circumstances to take reasonable steps to render them innocuous. The duty was not absolute to render them innocuous, but to take reasonable steps to that end. It was open to a jury to find that the guards should, for instance, have been painted white in the seventeen days which elapsed between the chief constable's order extinguishing the lights and the night of the accident. Whether the defendants were in fact negligent, or whether the court would have come to the same conclusion, was immaterial, there being evidence on which the jury could find negligence.

THINGS TAMMANY CANNOT DO

New Laws and Restrictions Prevent Changes—Pessimism Unwarranted, Says R. Fulton Cutting.

NEW YORK CITY'S pay-as-you-go financial policy has been, as every one knows, written into law. The newly elected Controller cannot fulfill his intention of abolishing it unless the State Legislature repeals its action of 1916. But that is only one of the changes that have been made in the City Government since the heyday of Tammany power. Coming into a position of undivided authority over the administration of the City Government for the next four years, holding every elective office, controlling every vote in the Board of Estimate, Tammany must find its rule still hampered by changes in the city's laws made during the past few years, especially during the Mitchel administration.

R. Fulton Cutting, Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Bureau of Municipal Research since the establishment of that body in 1906, is not so discouraged over the prospect for the next four years as are many less well-informed New Yorkers.

"Many friends of good government in New York City can see nothing but disaster in Tammany's victory at the last election," Mr. Cutting said. "Already they imagine a return of the Van Wyck and Croker tragedies. The budget will be inflated by padded payrolls, fraudulent contracts, and extravagant purchases from 'friends.' A pall of civic darkness will settle down upon the city while the Tiger stalks abroad.

"Such pessimism is wholly unwarranted. The growth of public sentiment in civic matters and the improvement in the system of municipal administration itself during the last ten years have made impossible the return of the gross evils of earlier times.

"The growth in civic sentiment may be in part ascribed to the spread of education in things municipal and in part to the vital character of the services rendered by the city to the people. It is not necessary for me to say how close to the life of the people comes the administration of the great departments having to do with health, charities, correction, fire, police, streets, water supply, docks, and ferries and so on through the long list of municipal activities. The technology of the Government has become so complicated that the hack politician will not venture his neck in the more responsible posts. If the political hack were willing, the danger of discrediting the party with the people would be so great that the leaders, no matter how unscrupulous, will not undertake the hazard of appointing him to high office. The character of the department heads under McClellan, Gaynor, and Mitchel is proof that Mr. Low's administration opened a new era in our municipal life. We may look forward without apprehension to practically anything that Tammany may do in filling responsible posts. The new appointees will find intrenched in their offices systems of control and administrative methods which will prove to be barriers against incompetence and neglect of duty.

"There is even greater assurance to be found in the advance in the science of city administration under McClellan, Gaynor, and Mitchel. It would be impossible to record here all of the technical devices which have been perfected to flood the far corners of the Government with the daylight of lay and expert scrutiny. Systems of accounting have been installed, records have been set up, bureaus established, budget practices elaborated, civil service standards inaugurated, lines of authority concentrated at points that can be watched, specifications and documents standardized, all to the end that the government of the city may be efficient and that moral responsibility may be immediately fixed. This advance has been made necessary by the growing technical requirements of the city, and only one who has watched it through the work of the Bureau of Municipal Research can appreciate how great it is. No one party or Mayor deserves all of the credit for it. The progress, begun under Low, was continued unabated under McClellan and Gaynor, and accelerated under Mitchel. If the citizens of New York have bad government for the next four years the blame will fall upon their own heads.

"Space will admit of only one illustration of the truth that institutions and practices rather than the mere intentions of 'good men' elected to office bring efficient administration — remembering all of the time that very few of the 86,000 employes of the city will leave their posts on Jan. 1, 1918. Take the present budget practices. In the old days heads of departments made their requests in generalities, and received enormous lump sums for supplies and personal services. Demands upon the city treasury were logrolled and jockeyed through the Board of Estimate and Apportionment and the Board of Aldermen, neither of which had any definite information as a basis for action. Sums once granted could be spent almost at the pleasure of the department head. He could buy junk from a 'friend' or hire henchmen during the busy days preceding elections. The Controller had to approve every requisition that was not simply outrageous.

"Today all that is changed," Mr. Cutting continued. "The department heads must make out their requests upon highly complicated sheets, which go into almost infinite details as to the personal services and supplies required for the work planned. These requests and the hearings on them are open to the public. The Board of Estimate and Apportionment has two important agencies —the Bureau of Personal Service and the Bureau of Contract Supervision—which examine throughout the year the work of the several departments, and are prepared to report critically on the needs of all the divisions of the Government. The board, therefore, does not have to work in the dark in making allowances of public funds. When the appropriation is once made it appears in a highly itemized form, permitting expenditures for the specified purposes and for those purposes only. Supervision over the disbursement of funds for the exact purposes specified by law is vested in the Controller, and through his office may be watched the smallest rivulets which flow out of the Treasury. Any citizen or citizens' agency can follow the process from beginning to end. The records and procedures are open to the public. For ten years the Bureau of Municipal Research has been helping public officers in the development and operation of these engines of publicity and efficiency, and it will offer its services to the new administration. A return to the corrupt and unlawful practices of the past is impossible.

"This is but one illustration from among many that might be given to show that New York City has left far behind the 'dark-room' government of a generation ago. Many hands and minds have contributed to this great result. The system," concluded Mr. Cutting, "like a coral reef, has been built up by hundreds of conscientious workers—accountants, lawyers, engineers, and laymen—and cannot be overturned in four years of any partisan government unless the citizens relax all vigilance."

Among the specific changes that have been made under the present administration, one of the most striking is that in the Civil Service. This has been extended and reorganized under the administration of Mayor Mitchel, and it will be almost impossible for the incoming administration to undo this work. The program of the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of Personal Service of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment for the last three years has been to effect a gradual standardization of the 80,000 to 90,000 positions in the classified civil service of the city.

The standardization work has been applied to practically every department. It has not yet reached the last step which was to standardize the titles of positions, but it has been applied to salary increases, new salaries, new positions, and to definitions of work through the terms and conditions attached to the budget. The object has been to end wide discrepancies in pay for the same kind and grade of work. This has been accomplished to a very large degree, and has been so incorporated into the departments that it would be almost impossible to restore the uneven conditions of a few years ago.

Further, many positions, running into the hundreds, have been taken out of the exempt class of political patronage and have been put into the competitive class. All of the men and women affected now receive the full protection of civil service and can only be removed in accordance with civil service law. Even if they are removed through a compliance with the forms of the law their successors cannot be appointed out of hand, but must be appointed in the order of their standing on civil service eligible lists after competitive examination.

Should the new administration decide to get rid of these appointees by abolishing the positions, new appointments would have to be made in accordance with civil service restrictions. The new Civil Service Commission for the city to be appointed by the next Mayor will not have a free hand by any means, because all of its rulings on appointments will be subject to the approval of the State Civil Service Commission. The State Civil Service Commission is a Republican body and has been very strict even with the present municipal Civil Service Commission.

A noteworthy change has also been made in regard to the budget. The budget procedure, which requires a certain amount of publicity regarding proposed appropriations for the city, was changed this year by an amendment to the law so as to advance the date when open consideration of the budget should begin before the Board of Estimate. This insures a longer period for examination and criticism of proposed expenditures by the public and by taxpayers' associations. It is only fair to say that this amendment was introduced at the instance of President Dowling of the Board of Aldermen, a Tammany man, and was passed through the Legislature by Senator James A. Foley, a Tammany Senator. The effect of the law, which was approved by Mayor Mitchel, has been successful, and it is considered unlikely now that it will be amended.

Without amendments to the laws of the State or charter provisions, there can be no abandonment of the widows' pension work, the fire prevention work, the tenement house laws, or the teachers' pension system. It is unlikely that amendments to these laws, excepting those designed to perfect their administration, can be obtained from the Legislature at Albany. Most of these matters have been inaugurated or perfected during Mayor Mitchel's term.

In the course of study in the public schools there cannot be any great change, because the school courses must be designed to meet the requirements of the Regents of the University of the State of New York.

In the administration of the excise law requiring the closing of saloons, &c., the city has only limited authority through the Police Department, and the policy has been more and more in recent years to leave that to the State Excise Department, which is in Republican hands. Besides, the city will vote next April on whether New York City is to be placed under the provisions of the new local option law.

In the matter of the west side improvement the new administration is also subject to control by existing law. Under the Ottinger law passed by the Legislature this year, the present city administration, acting through the committee of the Board of Estimate, jointly with the Public Service Commission, must find an acceptable solution of the west side-Eleventh Avenue-New York Central problem. Unless an agreement can be reached between the city, the Public Service Commission, and the railroad before the end of this year, the Public Service Commission, which is a State body composed entirely of Republicans, is empowered to deal with the question in the same way it may deal with any other matter involving the removal of tracks from the surface of streets and highways. In other words, the next administration will have no jurisdiction over this matter unless the Legislature again amends the law.

With regard to the pay-as-you-go policy, it may be pointed out that the present State administration, which enacted the law, is Republican, and the question of repeal is considered doubtful at least.

In fact, the new administration will apparently be definitely restricted from making any wholesale or revolutionary changes in the City Government or in city departments. The changes that may be made are in general only in administrative policy, in the method of interpreting laws and ordinances. Most of the former "patronage" is gone, having been put into the civil service, and changes in these positions will be subject to the approval of the State authorities.

The Beetle Pest

THE question where do all of the farm pests come from is often asked. An attempt to answer the question opens up one of the most interesting chapters in the history of agriculture in this country. Take one illustration:

We can hardly blame the potato beetle for being a potato beetle, for it was all our fault. During the early days he lived a happy, carefree life, secure in the hills of Colorado, and was modest enough to want nothing more than an abundant supply of the solanum weed. This, he fortunately had in unlimited quantity. He had never seen a potato. But the settlers finding that the potato produced satisfactory returns per acre planted larger and larger areas of them. The potato plantations increased in number and spread from State to State, always moving westward. When Colorado was reached, there was found this vast tract of virgin soil on which grew nothing but the solanum weed and the potato beetle. These rich lands were plowed up, the weeds destroyed, and the planters were happy in the thought that they had still further tamed the Western wilderness. But during this process the potato beetle found himself in a very embarassing position. His food had been almost completely taken away from him, and he was left with nothing but an appetite. Such a situation would surely test the resources of any beetle. But the Colorado beetle was not to be found wanting. He used what man provided, and developed a ravenous appetite for potato vines, since that was the only thing in sight, and there was plenty of them.

Like many another habit, the fondness for potato vines became a very gripping one. It was like olives. And then, there was such a vast supply that it was a pleasurable pastime eating one's way from State to State until the varieties of each locality had been sampled. Hence, the Colorado potato beetle. Fortunately, however, we have the means of repairing at least some of the damage, for while we cannot grow solanum weed for the beetle's special benefit, yet we can make his life on the potato vines very hazardous.

Paris green has been the deadly dose that has been meted out to him very largely in times past, but there are some good reasons why this is objectionable. There is no question whatever about the ability of paris green to render the beetle hors de combat, but on account of the relatively large amount of water soluble arsenic in this material it is apt to take the vine as well as the insect. A great deal of injury has been done in times past in this manner. Arsenate of lead offers a form of arsenic which may be administered in homeopathic doses and yet be very efficient—killing the beetle but not harming the plant. Two and one half to three pounds of arsenate of lead mixed with fifty gallons of water sprayed on the vines when the beetles are known to be present will bring about a complete spirit of contrition on the part of the beetle and a longing for the old days in Colorado.

NEW YORK'S MARVELOUS GROWTH TOWARD THE EAST

Within a Decade Queens Borough Has Bloomed Into Vast Industrial Centre and Residential District

By RALPH PETERS,
President of the Long Island Railroad.

THOSE who are thoroughly familiar with the geography and statistics of Queens Borough, who know the value of its close proximity to the more populous sections of the world's greatest metropolis, who have kept constantly in touch with its growth, and are aware of the rapid strides made in the past decade—only those New Yorkers realise the vast spread of their city to the eastward.

To appreciate the movement they must have followed the advance of transportation facilities—railroads, trolley, elevated, and subway line construction and extension; the opening of new waterways and erection of gigantic bridges spanning the East River, the wonderful industrial growth, the mounting population, and extensive building operations of the newly developed district. Those who have kept in touch with these things realise, as I have during the last twelve years, that the day is not far off when Queens Borough will not only be the most attractive home borough of New York City, but will occupy fourth or fifth position among the most important manufacturing centres in America.

From a political viewpoint the Borough of Queens is considered as a part of New York City. Geographically speaking it comprises the western end of Long Island. It covers an area of 117 square miles. It is the largest of the city's five boroughs. Compared with the principal cities of the United States it stand fifth in size, the four cities having more mileage being Greater New York, New Orleans, Chicago, and Philadelphia. It ranks eighteenth in the country's population centres. According to the tabulation below, Queens is more than five times as large in area as Manhattan, almost three times as large as the Bronx, and equal to the combined areas of Manhattan, Bronx, and Richmond Boroughs.

	Acres.	Square Miles.	P.C. of Total.
Queens	75,111	117.36	37.4
Brooklyn	49,880	77.62	24.7
Richmond	36,800	57.19	18.2
Manhattan	14,028	21.93	6.8
Bronx	26,017	40.85	12.9

With probably little more than one-third of this vast territory built up, there is, indeed, ample room for more intensified residential, commercial, and industrial development. During my connection with the Long Island Railroad I have seen the population of Queens rise from 198,340 in 1905 to 396,727 in 1915, and approximately 420,000 in 1916. I think when a count is taken at the end of 1917 the total will not be far from the half million mark. Judging from the healthy increases in population in the last few years, the prediction of Dr. Joseph Caccavajo, Consulting Engineer, in 1912, that Queens would have 900,000 inhabitants by 1920 and 1,900,000 by 1930, appears to be well founded.

A consistent addition of transportation facilities since 1909 has been primarily responsible for the steady influx of Manhattan's and Brooklyn's overflow population. The network of transportation lines, attracting people to live there and bringing in scores of huge industrial concerns, is summed up as follows in a report of the Chamber of Commerce of Queens, an organization which has been identified with every step in the borough's progress:

Prior to 1909 the only means of direct transportation from Queens Borough to Manhattan was over the old Long Island Railroad ferry at Thirty-fourth Street. Since that time, however, five costly bridges and tunnels have been opened, which are bringing the vast areas of Queens into closer touch with Manhattan's business sections.

The first link was the Queensboro Bridge itself, opened for trolley and vehicular traffic in July, 1909.

The second link was the Pennsylvania Station and operation of electric trains of the Long Island Railroad to all parts of Queens Borough.

The third link was the operation of Queensboro Subway trains from Forty-second Street and Lexington Avenue, Manhattan, to Long Island City on June 22, 1915, with free transfers to all parts of the present subway.

The fourth link was the operation of passenger trains across the New York Connecting Railroad Bridge at Hell Gate in April, 1917. The operation of freight service across this bridge will start this Fall, giving an all-rail route between Queens and the New England States, saving on an average of twenty-four hours on all such shipments of freight.

The fifth link is the operation of the Second Avenue elevated across the Queensboro Bridge, which will bring into close touch the most congested section of the city, on the east side of Manhattan, and the least developed portion of the city—the Borough of Queens. These two parts of the city are in sight of each other, but with the East River separating them.

The sixth link will be the operation of the B. R. T. trains of the Broadway-Fifty-ninth Street line through the new tunnel from Second Avenue and Sixtieth Street, Manhattan, under the East River to the Bridge Plaza station. This tunnel, it is expected, will be in operation in the Fall of 1918.

I may add that there is soon to be a seventh link, due to an agreement covering the lease of Long Island Railroad trackage rights, which will enable trains of the Dual Rapid Transit system to operate over our electrified lines on the north side, from Corona, through Flushing to Whitestone Landing and Little Neck.

In no small measure have the Long Island Railroad and its parent company, the Pennsylvania, contributed to the upbuilding of Queens. Almost every dollar of the hundred-odd millions expended by the Pennsylvania Railroad in its gigantic scheme of improvements in and around New York City has in some way or other inured to the benefit of Queens. The Pennsylvania Station in the heart of the city has brought about the substitution of electric traction for steam to such an extent that, out of a total of about 220 miles of electrified line on the entire Long Island Railroad system, which cost nearly $15,000,000, no less than 173.83 miles are in Queens. Add 246 miles of track devoted to operation of steam trains and some idea may be had of the intensive railroad development embraced in that borough.

By means of the rapid transit lines passing under or over the East River, the length of time required from the place of residence in Queens to the place of occupation or amusement in Manhattan is shorter than that required for the residents of upper Manhattan, the Bronx or even Brooklyn in getting to their places of occupation or amusement.

Millions of dollars have been spent by the Long Island Railroad in the elimination of grade crossings in the Borough of Queens, by elevating or depressing the tracks. Since 1910 some forty-four crossings at grade have been abolished in Queens.

The following table, showing the number of commuters during a certain month in 1910 compared with the corresponding month of 1917, speaks for itself:

It will be observed that several entirely new residential sections have been established in Queens in the last eight years. At every station, except two, there have been substantial increases in commutation travel. The decrease at Richmond Hill and Winfield are due to the recent extension of city rapid transit lines paralleling our property. When the Dual Rapid Transit System is extended to Whitestone and Little Neck by means of the proposed leasing of the Long Island Railroad tracks, further losses in commutation business will naturally result. In this connection, I desire to deny emphatically that we have opposed this municipal project at any time, although the public has from time to time been led to believe the railroad was holding up the matter. From the beginning the railroad has welcomed, rather than deplored, the coming of the new rapid transit line, and it has aimed constantly to bring about a speedy and successful termination of negotiations with the city authorities, so that the residents of the Third Ward of Queens Borough might have the benefit of the dual rapid transit system for which they are paying taxes, but which was principally developed in Manhattan, Bronx, and Brooklyn, in addition to the same efficient train service which we are at present rendering them.

Obviously, with large, expensive terminals to maintain, the Long Island Railroad cannot begin to compete against the low fares offered by city-owned lines, and for the reason that it would relieve us from a short-haul commutation traffic in a region that is quickly being dotted with cheaper transit facilities, we have advocated the use of our tracks, and not discouraged the proposed extension of the city lines in any way at all. What the Long Island Railroad Company has vigorously opposed, however, is the construction of a parallel line. We argued against such a plan on the ground that it would saddle an unnecessarily large expenditure upon the city, when it was possible to lease our tracks and provide the necessary service to the public at an annual rental less than the actual cost of maintaining several miles of new line, a number of costly stations and power plants. The Long Island Railroad is only seeking a reasonable rental for the lease of its tracks, and I am glad to learn that it looks as if an arrangement satisfactory to all parties concerned will soon be consummated.

Last Summer I ventured the prediction that the Long Island Railroad would this year occupy first place among the railroads carrying commuters in and out of New York City. The sale of commutation tickets in the first ten months of 1917 totals 236,814. November and December sales will approximate 40,000 tickets, so that all told we will have handled the unprecedented total of 276,814 commuters, and with an average monthly sale of 23,067 sixty-ride tickets the railroad will be recognized as the foremost commuting railroad in New York. When you stop to consider that in 1910 there were but 142,427 commuters on all branches, compared with 254,803 in 1916 and approximately 276,000 in 1917, some idea is gained of the part which the road has played in the development, not alone of Queens, but Long Island's two other counties—Nassau and Suffolk.

Thousands of dwellings, stores, factories, and miscellaneous structures have been erected in Queens in ten years. The following table shows the number of buildings of all kinds put up in the various sections of Queens in 1915 and 1916:

Add the 25,053 buildings constructed from 1909 to 1914, inclusive, and we find that 33,838 structures have sprung up in Queens in the eight-year period—1909 to 1916—or at the rate of 4,229 buildings a year. In the amount of money expended for building construction in 1916 Queens ranks sixth among the principal cities in the United States, and also ranks sixth in assessed valuation, which in 1914 was nearly $500,000,000.

The history of industrial development in Queens may be summed up thus:

In 1889 the borough had 395 factories; the value of manufactured products was $35,427,000; the capital invested in these plants amounted to $67,420,000, and the wages paid to employes totaled $1,264,000. In 1904 Queens had 518 factories; the number of employes working in them was 16,669; the value of manufactured products was $92,941,000; the capital invested amounted to $92,977,000, and the wages paid totaled $1,836,000. In 1909 Queens had 771 factories; the value of manufactured products was $151,680,000; the number of employes was 27,495; the capital invested amounted to $145,307,000, and the wages paid totaled $4,407,000. In 1916 the number of factories in Queens was 1,169; the number of employes 63,964; the value of manufactured products was $323,128,000; the capital invested amounted to $230,000,000, and the wages paid out to workers was $46,921,000.

The labor supply of the borough cannot be equaled in any other part of the country. I could enumerate scores of new industrial concerns which have already taken advantage of the opportunity to locate in Queens. The number of factories has increased by nearly 400 since 1909. The Degnon Terminal development in Long Island City deserves special mention. Its promoters have brought to Queens such plants as the Loose-Wiles Biscuit Company, Defender Manufacturing Company, Kindel Bed Company, Marcus Ward, Inc.; Studebaker Corporation, American Ever Ready Works of the National Carbon Company, Brett Lithographic Company, and Reme Metallic Bedstead Company.

In a word, the development in a decade of Queens has been phenomenal. Judging by the past and the present, I can see visions of the borough as one of our greatest industrial centres and a place where millions of people will live in contentment.

MOVING PICTURES FOR THE CHILDREN

By JANE STANNARD JOHNSON.

BOBBY, aged eight, rushed pell-mell into the house early one afternoon and, tossing his hat into a corner, cried excitedly:

"Oh, mamma, give me ten cents. I'm going to the picture show!"

"What picture are you going to see?" questioned his mother.

"Thou shalt not covet thy Neighbor's Wife, replied Bobby, eagerly. "All the boys are going."

"But I don't think you ought to go to see a picture like that, Bobby," said his mother.

"What's the matter with that picture?" asked Bobby. "It's in the Bible."

In this conversation, an actual occurrence, lies the kernel of the reason on which is based the necessity for special motion-picture performances for children. There are legions of Bobbies throughout the country, to say nothing of an equivalent number of little Dorothies with Bobby's viewpoint and logic.

There is no more vivid method of teaching than by moving pictures and, as thousands of children daily attend picture shows, the silent impressions of the screen are entering quite as effectively into the child's moral and educational development as the lessons of the home or the school. So great is the influence of the screen that it may easily bear a vital relation to the welfare of our nation, since the boys who are today building their character for life work are the ones who tomorrow will be assuming the duties of citizenship and filling the places of our boys now gone to the trenches.

Now this does not mean at all that children should not go to see motion pictures. They should. The film is the family entertainment. Where the family goes the children must go. But it does mean that a duty devolves upon parents to know what pictures the children will see in case they attend the regular daily performance.

The alternative is a performance especially for children, where only suitable films will be shown. For several years past the question has been agitated considerably by women throughout the United States. In some cities children's performances have been attempted with varying degrees of success. St. Paul, Louisville, Los Angeles, Seattle, Washington, Atlanta, Columbus, Buffalo, Providence, and Philadelphia are among the cities where the idea has been tried.

Some of these efforts have been initiated by mothers' clubs and parents' associations and some by women's clubs. An organization called the National Juvenile Motion-Picture Board has for two or three years endeavored to promote children's performances throughout the States. This organization has a membership widely scattered, with headquarters in New York. It has secured large numbers of films, and has from time to time issued lists of films which it considered suitable for children.

Viewing the situation from all sides, I decided a year ago to test the possibility and the practicability of children's performances, regardless of the experience of other women.

The first exhibitor I approached wholly disapproved. Other women had tried it and failed, he said. But I won his consent to give it a trial.

My next step was to secure the co-operation of the schools. The Principal of the school nearest the theatre, whose head had shown interest in the project, took up the matter at a mothers' meeting and asked for the names of those who would volunteer to help care for the children and act as guardians at the theatre Saturday mornings, the time at which the shows were to be held. About twenty-five names were offered and thus our working committee was secured.

The selection of the program and arranging for the films was the most difficult part. First, it was essential that the exhibitor at least clear his expenses. Further, I wanted the best films that the market afforded; not merely educational films, but pictures for a "sure enough picture show just like the ones daddy goes to." If the child is to be kept away from pictures during the week on the promise of going Saturday morning, he must see a better show than he would see at the regular performance.

I decided that a program of the same high grade as the programs at the leading Broadway theatres, using films suited to the child, would best fill the bill. It must include a teaching of patriotism; scenes of travel; something about birds, fishes, flowers and animals; glimpses of various activities of our Government; a review of current events; and always a funny film that should also be refined and clever.

All the foregoing are in short reels, which must be selected and sorted each week. But there was need also of a feature story and, none of these being made especially for children, I had to choose such as were free from portrayals of crime, "triangle" situations, immorality, and dishonesty.

I personally visited all of the leading film exchanges, sought the man at the head, explained to him the plan and purpose, and told him that to carry it through it would be absolutely necessary for him to make special rental prices on such of his films as I might select. This, without exception, the companies agreed to do.

After the performance had been held for some weeks and it seemed a certainty there would be a goodly attendance regularly, the Boy Scouts of America were asked to co-operate by detailing eight or ten boys to assist in handling the children. This they very gladly consented to do, after hearing about the work and its purpose, and thereafter the Boy Scouts were our very valued assistants in keeping the youngsters in line, acting as ushers, tending fire doors, and in many other ways.

When the first cold days of Fall arrived this year the minds of the little folks turned again to indoor amusement. Meeting the theatre Director who had originally volunteered his co-operation on the street one day, he said: "About fifty kids are around my theatre door every Saturday morning asking when the morning shows are to start again." So the first one of this season was arranged, and, though some changes have been made necessary by war conditions, the performances are satisfactorily attended this season and promise to be a success.

NEWS AND NOTES OF THE MUSICAL WORLD

Anecdotes of Verdi Told by Metropolitan Director --Puccini's "Tosca" Bells.

By Giulio Gatti-Casazza.

EVERY time I happen to meet that man so abundant in mentality and genius who answers to the name of Luigi Illica, I never fail to reiterate my advice that he write his memoirs, which certainly would provide material for one of the most interesting, original, and enjoyable books that ever have appeared.

I hope that some day my friend Illica will respond to my wish so repeatedly expressed. In the meantime, however, I shall permit myself to anticipate, in a modest way, a little chapter of his future volume, convinced that he will pardon my indiscretion.

Illica for many years lived in the country. First he had a home at Castellarquato, in the Piacentino, on the top of a hill. Now he has abandoned the uplands and has come down to the plains to occupy a charming little villa which he recently had built not far from Busseto, the village which had the honor of giving birth to Giuseppe Verdi.

Last year in September I went to pay a visit to my friend and spent two most enjoyable days in his house. Illica is the prince of causeurs. He has been a politician and a journalist, and later, as a dramatic author, having been in touch with the entire world of Italian theatrical art, he has at his disposal an inexhaustible repertory of anecdote. In addition, an incomparable humorist, with a rather caustic spirit, he knows how to give his stories a most original and attractive cachet, so that to listen to him is one of the greatest delights imaginable.

On the occasion I mention he entertained me with the recital of many incidents of his very active life, and especially of his relations with composers for whom he had written librettos—Catalani, Franchetti, Mascagni, Giordano, Puccini, to mention only the best known.

At one point of our conversation we were talking about "Tosca," which I had the pleasure of launching for the first time at the Scala of Milan.

"Perhaps you do not know," said Illica to me, "that I prepared 'Tosca' originally not for Puccini but for Franchetti. It was in 1895. With Franchetti," continued my friend, "everything had been agreed upon. He was altogether satisfied and already had composed the first scene, when, unexpectedly, he declared to me that he did not intend to continue the work as he was convinced that the libretto was anti-musical—unfitted for an opera. I protested against this strange and, in my opinion, unjustified condemnation. I brought forward all the arguments I could think of to combat those of Franchetti, but it was useless, as he would not yield, maintaining his position firmly.

"Finally one day, after we had been unable to come to any settlement, Franchetti proposed that we refer the controversy to an authority of the first order and let him decide definitely, adding:

"'I have requested Maestro Verdi to be the judge, and he has consented; do you accept?'

"Naturally," continued Illica, "I accepted without hesitation, and one morning, like two litigants, we started for the Hotel Milan, accompanied by Giulio Ricordi.

"Verdi received us cordially and invited me to read the libretto.

"I read the first and then the second act, and the great maestro, without too much effusion, showed that he was very well satisfied. I passed on to the third act and Verdi warmly praised the changes I had made in the Sardou drama. I recited the verses beginning:

"'E lucean le stelle' * * *

"And when I finished them Verdi jumped to his feet, and in accents suffused with emotion said to me:

"'Bellissimo! bellissimo! ma bravo, Illica!'

"Franchetti at first was dumfounded, but presently inquired: 'Then it really has made such a good impression on you? The libretto indeed pleases you?'

"'Of course it pleases me,' replied Verdi. 'Why, the situation is a genuine discovery. The farewell to life and the woman beloved of the poor Cavaradossi, upon whom, only a few hours before, everything smiled! The scene having as its subject the Castle Sant'angelo, with St. Peter's in the background, as the dawn breaks over Rome! Why, all this is magnificent.' And turning to Franchetti he continued: 'What in the world do you young composers want? Are you not content even with good fortune? Would that I might have had such an excellent libretto—I who in my youth had to be satisfied with all kinds of stuff. Ah, me! What a misfortune it is to be old.'

"Franchetti, more and more astonished and mortified at Verdi's display of enthusiasm, and not risking a contradiction, ventured to say to the great eulogist, who still continued to express his laudatory impressions:

"'One moment, Maestro, that is all very well; the verses will be fine for the tenor. But, how would you treat them? Would you write recitative? or an arioso or a real romance? Tell me, tell me!'

"And Verdi: 'My dear Franchetti, I would simply make some music—a little music, that's all.'"

* * * * * * *

"About a year, it seems to me, after this event"—it is still Illica who is talking—"I was asked one day by Giulio Ricordi to call at his office as he had something interesting to tell me.

"I went at once, and, arriving, he said to me:

"'The libretto which you've written, entitled "Lorenza," and which Maestro Mascheroni was engaged to set to music, must be turned over to another composer. Maestro Mascheroni has made no objection. Let us hear what you think about it.'

"'Oh, dio mio!' I replied. 'Is this the interesting matter which you have to tell me? Nothing else except to change the composer of "Lorenza"? Excuse me, but this is a fine bit of annoyance.'

"Mascheroni and I already had arranged everything.

"'Come, come!' said Guilio Ricordi, 'be calm and have patience. This is a question of favoring a talented young composer upon whom the libretto has made a deep impression.'

"'Santa Maria!' I exclaimed, 'this business of young composers is a continued nuisance. But is he really young?'

"'Very young.'

"'Has he real talent?'

"'Unquestionably. He has genuine talent.'

"'And what's the name of this young chap?'

"'Giuseppe Verdi!'

"I was speechless—stunned. Then said Ricordi, ironically:

"'Isn't that sufficient? Perhaps you want a better one. You poets—when will you ever be satisfied?'

"At length I recovered from my astonishment and replied: 'Do you mean that Verdi, at the age of eighty-three, wants to compose again and to my libretto? It doesn't seem to me possible.'

"'So possible,' responded Ricordi, 'that the Maestro is at the Hotel Milan waiting to talk with you. Enough discussion! Let us go along.'

"While we were walking to the hotel I was thinking about my libretto, upon which such extraordinary good fortune had smiled. As all now know, it deals with the story of a brigand, Carmine, a man of great courage, whom the authorities have been unable to capture or drive out of the country, and whom finally they seek to entrap by means of the diabolical attractiveness of Lorenza, a woman as beautiful as she is clever. She accordingly has herself captured by Carmine's band of outlaws, and then prepares her snare to fascinate Carmine. By and by the brigand surrenders to her charms. She, too, finds herself attracted by the good looks and the dashing qualities of the outlaw. So that, when the plans for the betrayal arranged beforehand with the police are about to be carried out, Lorenza, not being able to offset them in time and mad with love and desperation, sacrifices her own life to save that of her lover, whom she enables to escape.

"When we reached the hotel the Grand Old Man received us in his usual parlor.

"'See here, Illica,' said he without any preliminaries, 'your libretto is interesting. Two excellent characters, those of Lorenza and Carmine the brigand. Then, the situations are well conceived. Altogether, the libretto is well worked out, and has the quality of interest which holds the attention throughout. There are, however, a few defects, but they can be remedied easily. For example, at this point,'—and the Maestro made a suggestion.

"We listen to him in admiration. I am delighted and almost doubt my senses. But all of a sudden, while I am telling him that his observations were justified, and that the changes suggested could be most easily made, Verdi jumps to his feet, his face suddenly darkening, and says:

"'No, no; I must not write any more! It would be a terrible mistake.'

"Ricordi and I, upset and painfully surprised by the unexpected turn of events, united our efforts, begging him to carry out his original purpose, but, shaking his leonine head, he refused inexorably.

"'No, my friends,' said he, 'don't insist! Don't make me undertake something that I couldn't finish. And, besides, to take a libretto already prepared for another—no, no, it would only bring me failure.'

"'But Maestro, why do you talk like this?'

"Without feeling he added: 'There is another reason which admits of no reply, a reason that can't be controverted—I am 83 years old; do you understand?—83 years old! Perhaps the head still could do the work, but the hand could not make the record.' He hesitated, then resumed:

"'So, Illica, and you, Giulio, forgive me; but I beg you not to talk to me any more about the matter. Let "Lorenza" remain with the one to whom it belongs; let Mascheroni keep it. Enough of this.'

"We dare not persist. We couldn't say another word. The Maestro, with a sad face and full of regret, while we remained deeply disappointed, continued to shake his white head, repeating:

"'No, I must not; I cannot. It is finished—forever.'

"And then and there," added Illica in melancholy tone, "I lost the greatest chance of my career."

I shall finish with a little anecdote relating to Verdi and "Tosca," which I owe, not to Illica, but to a celebrated orchestra leader, Leopoldo Mugnone, who was an intimate friend of the great Maestro.

"In the Summer of 1899," said Mugnone, who is a raconteur of color and warmth, as a true Neapolitan should be, "I was at the springs of Montecatini at the same time as Verdi. He knew that from time to time I had been going to the neighboring town of Pistoia, and one day inquired:

"'If I am not impertinent, may I ask what the deuce you go to Pistoia for?'

"'Why, Maestro,' said I, 'I go there to supervise the casting of the bells for "Tosca." Puccini's new opera, which will be given this Winter, and which I shall conduct.'

"'What's that? the "bells" of "Tosca"? How many "bells" are there and what are they used for?'

"'They will be used in the third act, which pictures the awakening of Rome with the chimes of the various churches, and there are eleven of them.'

"Verdi gave a start of astonishment and exclaimed: 'Eleven bells! Impossible!'

"The old composer left me, murmuring as he went: 'Eleven! eleven! Per Bacco! It seems incredible.'

"Some days passed, when one morning, at the Tettuccio Spring, Verdi inquired of me:

"'How are your eleven bells getting along, my dear Mugnone? I believe there are eleven—am I right?'

"'They are coming along well and there are really eleven of them,' I responded.

"'And to think,' added the Maestro, 'that when I composed "Il Trovatore" I was so much perplexed as to whether or not I should introduce that one poor bell in the Miserere! It seemed to me that all the impresarios of that period would hurl their curses at me, so that I really don't know how at the time I decided to let it stay there. There's nothing more to say except that the world has progressed—at least the operatic world!'"

SUBSCRIBERS' WAR TAX.

A Suggestion That Opera Lovers Let U. S. Keep $75,000 Fund.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Last evening I was told by a subscriber to the Metropolitan Opera House that the war tax levied would be refunded to those who paid their subscriptions before Nov. 1. I felt tempted to refute it, but refrained. Nevertheless, I could not reconcile myself to the thought that it might be true. Imagine my surprise this morning upon opening THE TIMES to find that a ruling to that effect was made.

From a spirit of patriotism the thought suggested itself, since the amount of war tax to those who can afford to partake of opera individually will not amount to much, what a splendid commentary it would be if those subscribers refused to accept the refund! This $75,000 is a nice, snug sum, and, since so much stress is and has been laid as to what a $50 Liberty bond will buy, nothing need be said further as to what good that $75,000 would do!

Why isn't something done for those who frequent the 10, 15, and 25 cent shows? To those 5 cents is an item. The poor need that sort of recreation every bit as much as others need opera.

New York, Nov. 13, 1917. S. S.

BELGIAN LOSS AND OURS.

Cathedrals of Northern France, Too, on "Altar of Patriotism."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Is it necessary to mention what Belgium and France are sacrificing of magnificent buildings, churches, cathedrals, of paintings and statues, upon "the altar of patriotism"? And then to talk about "sacrifice," because a few German operas are taken off the program for the Winter performances in New York! Patriotic Americans who love their country give willingly everything—their sons, husbands, fathers, home, and luxury—will be ready to starve if necessary for "the flag" and "country." America has been too indulgent and liberal with this kind of Americans, who, in my opinion, are pro-Germans, and who now, when our brave boys and men, fine citizens, are killed in action or taken prisoners in Germany, can only think upon their own pleasure and enjoyments, and call it a "sacrifice" to be without a few German operas during wartime. No good patriot could ever feel disgusted with the Metropolitan Directors for their action.

THE CASE OF KREISLER.

His Conduct "Irreproachable" Since America Entered War.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

As an admirer of Fritz Kreisler, I wish to protest against the cancellation of his concert engagements in numerous cities. To assume such an attitude toward the greatest violinist in the world is the act of narrow-minded and ignorant people. Kreisler is an Austrian, it is true. But we have not declared war on Austria. Even if we had, why should a national condition interfere with art which is universal?

Mr. Kreisler, since the beginning of the war on America's part, has conducted himself in an irreproachable manner. He has given his services to various benefits for our own Red Cross, he is supporting some dozen or more Russian and Serbian orphans, he has sent large sums of money to destitute musicians of all nationalities who are stranded in Vienna.

Noncombatant Artist Abroad Was Not Treated Like Those Here.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

If Dr. Muck thinks "art knows no frontier" will he explain why his country's ally interns a French noncombatant opera singer, Dinh Gilly, who desires to come to America?

A LOYAL ARTIST.

MRS. FISKE AND LEO DITRICHSTEIN RE-ENTER

PINERO REDIVIVUS

By JOHN CORBIN.

ON a snap judgment it would probably have been said that it is at once too late to revive Pinero and too early. Memories are still painfully recent of the moment in which he faded behind the onrushing figures of Barrie and Shaw. And the day has not yet come when he can be seen clearly in historic perspective—seen clearly, yet seen also in "the pathos of distance" and its picturesqueness. There was a time when even Colonial mahogany was relegated to the dust-laden attic twilight; and, by the same token, mid-Victorian walnut and haircloth are even now appearing in fashionable shop windows, before a generation which can see once more that the materials are in themselves beautiful, and that at their best were used with a distinct sense of style. But such recurrence of fashion, as it seemed, takes time. The revival of "The Gay Lord Quex" has upset prognostication. Thanks partly to the wholesome and vigorous art of John Drew, and partly to the consummate effectiveness of the struggle between Quex and Sophy in the bedroom of the Duchess of Strood, the play gripped again, almost as it did of old, and seems certain to win at least a fair measure of public attention.

Yet of all Pinero's maturer successes this is the play in which he is least worthily himself. Is he here the realist we once vaunted him? It is true that no attempt is made to palliate the libertinism of Quex—to pretend that his love for young Muriel is anything more than the familiar passion of age for youth, of satiety for freshness; or that his premarital reformation is at all likely to endure. It is true that Sophy is throughout the catty little intriguer, that even in her moment of dramatic self-sacrifice she is the vulgar backstairs sentimentalist. Muriel Eden is as poor a thing as any of her kind, an abject victim of circumstances with neither the heart nor the mind to choose between her two wordlings or reject them both. If realism consists in eliminating vigorous nature and wholesome sentiment, then these characters are realistic enough. But the remaining people in the play verge upon caricature, and are at best pastiches Such "realism" as there is, moreover, is implied rather than stated—a virtue of omission. In the "great scene" one is rather led to accept Quex's reformation and Sophy's sentiment as genuine. Their characterization is conditioned, in short, not by an overwhelming love of truth, but by the necessities of the theatric structure. If Quex and Sophy had been otherwise the "great scene" would have suffered, perhaps vanished.

And is Pinero here the consummate technician? His dexterity is exerted, not to make the play as a whole an articulate rendering of life, or even a broadly consolidated dramatic unit. For it is neither of these things. Its be-all and its end-all is the single thrilling scene. Its astonishing skill is not bent to illumine our perceptions of reality, which is the high end of genuine drama, but to thrill and astonish us, which is the end of the magician and juggler. In a word, it is built on the plan of Sardou. It is not art but craft that keeps the piece alive today. The great Herrmann or the Hanlon Brothers, if they were to start up from the theatrical limbo, would delight us similarly.

Is it then objected that Pinero gives us no exquisite dotings upon the human heart, no airy excursions into the realm of humoresque whim and fancy? No; it is better that he is himself, not Barrie. Do we demand intellectual satire that springs from the clear-cut vision of a society remodeled upon some "new morality"? Assuredly, one Shaw is sufficiency. Ibsen himself was as deficient in intellectual perception as he was in tender charm and idyllic humor—though the Ibsenites of yore would stalk from their cobwebbed garret and gibber at the man who proclaimed it.

One substance, however, is universal in the drama—keenly observed character, impelled by vigorous motive. And one technique is eternal—the technique that bends every moment, every word uttered, to establish the integrity of the play as a whole. Deficient as Ibsen was in ideas, in sheer intellectuality, he felt deeply and portrayed vividly, in ever-varying personages, one of the two great forces in human society—an individualism verging always upon anarchy. If he seems outmoded today it is because, for the time, we are all realizing, under menace of the most thoroughly socialized state in all history, the importance of individual submission and service in the cause of civilization as a whole. As surely as the world progresses through recurrent cycles, the black walnut and haircloth of Henrik Ibsen will come into their own again.

But the leading people in the theatre of Pinero are as deficient in force as they are in charm of the heart and in originality of idea. Once, undergoing the Norwegian influence, he flaunted a Mrs. Ebbsmith, who lived without the bonds and chucked her Bible into the stove. And the British matron, who writhed at Barrie's mention of her Little Mary and raged at Shaw's flower girl who said "bloody," was not really shocked. The most Pinero could do was to make her raise an eyebrow.

What then was the quality in which Pinero deserves to be remembered? Late as it is, or early, we may hazard a conjecture. William Archer once spoke of an English actress as "one of the numerous ladies who have walked into fame on the arm of Mr. Pinero." In a contrary humor William Winter hurst into lyric rage against

The long parades
Of Arthur Wing Pinero jades.

At least he could write effective female parts! They were not, properly speaking, emotional rôles. The love of a lass for her lad, or a wife for her husband, of a mother for her child, never interested him. Compared to Barrie he was heartless, as he was indigent of ideas compared to Shaw. The most broadly human of his women is this Sophy Fullgarney, whose passion is one of friendship for a foster sister, and has somehow the air of being invented rather deliberately to serve the turn of a "great scene of the third act."

How came it that Paula Tanqueray was current so long on the stage? Not through love for any man, though Heaven knows she was not without opportunity in that sort. Hers was the passion of the courtesan for respectability, of the adventuress for security and peace. And her tragedy was that, when she had achieved her desire, she was temperamentally unable to profit by it. Her soul was essentially feline, desiring to be caressed, yet, on the slightest provocation, scratching the hand that stroked her. There was no question of her heart, only of over sensitive nerves. And Iris? She was a more amiable puss, though a weaker puss—but still a cat. In her way she loved young Trenwith; to her delicate senses he was the most pleasing of men. But even more pleasing was material well-being—physical ease and idleness; and, rather than taste either love or life to the full, she declined upon Maldonado, who in due course turned her out on the streets. Again a case of nerves, and again the fate of a cat.

It is only in a distant retrospect that one feels this, and then with a bit of a shock. For these plays are solidly characterized throughout—vivid, intelligent transcripts of life, fused into a mood of exquisite sympathy with feminine pain. "Iris" in particular—not in the American production, which was ruinously miscast, but with Fay Davis in the title rôle—with a tense and subtle presentment of high-bred suffering. It has been said that to love a dog is only an amiable form of egotism, the return of affection is so much greater, but that to love a cat is evidence of the most abundant unselfishness. If this is so, Pinero has a claim to at least one distinction of the heart.

These plays—and again "Iris" in particular—are genuine masterpieces of technique. No question here of fuse and fireworks! Every character, every word, is as true in itself as it is structurally essential to the whole. Tremulously sensitive as is the mood, it is everywhere controlled, informed, by the most rigidly pure taste. There is even an effect of architectonic austerity, as in Ibsen and in the Greeks.

Some day, years hence perhaps, "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" will be revived, or more probably "Iris," and then the world will know whether the cortège of Pinero women are only parading jades or a true, an illuminating record of the era that inspired and hailed them—a gallery of women suffering to the soul under a materialistic civilization.

WHO'S WHO ON SUNDRY STAGES

AUDREY MAPLE, whose delicate blonde beauty and pleasant voice constitute one of the distinct assets of the new Victor Herbert operetta, "Her Regiment," comes naturally by her musical talent. Her father was considered one of the best musicians of Trenton, Miss Maple's early home, but in spite of that fact Miss Maple did not find the road to the stage a ready-made one. Her mother stood firm in the belief that no girl's education was complete unless she were fitted to occupy a place in the business world should necessity demand it, so the daughter, after graduating from high school, was sent to a business college.

There she remained for two years, emerging as a really expert stenographer and typist. Thus fortified, she carefully eschewed anything that resembled an office and made her début on the stage as a chorus girl. Upon her escape from the chorus she was engaged by Jesse Lasky, then a vaudeville producer, as one of nine or ten piano players in an act called "The Pianophiends," one of the noisiest and, therefore, one of the most popular of all vaudeville turns.

After that experience she became Louise Gunning's understudy in "Tom Jones," and then returned to Mr. Lasky's management in "The Love Waltz." While in that production she was "discovered" by the late Henry B. Harris, and through his influence was given a small part in Charles Frohman's production of "The Arcadians." Later Mr. Frohman offered her one of the principal rôles in a road company of that piece, but at the moment she was not in a position to accept.

There followed "Madame Sherry," "Peggy," and then a term of years with Arthur Hammerstein, under whose direction she appeared in "The Firefly," "High Jinks" and "Katinka." Just prior to "Her Regiment" she appeared at the Hudson Theatre in "Good Night Paul," and almost managed to make even that moribund production worth while.

VERSATILITY is one quality to which Leonard Mudie of Laurette Taylor's company justly may lay claim. In "The Wooing of Eve" he is now playing a pensive and precious poet, a poseur of poseurs, a rôle as dissimilar from his part in "Out There" as could possibly be imagined. In "Out There" he was a wounded Cockney soldier, an ex-prizefighter devoid of any social flair, to put it mildly.

Mudie's training in England admirably fitted him for the assumption of strongly diversified character rôles. His first experience on the stage was as a member of Osmond Tearle's Shakespearean company, in which he played a round of parts embracing every sort of character. In "Macbeth," for instance, he played no less than four parts—the "bleeding Sergeant" in the first act; the apparition of the bloody child in one of the scenes in the witch's cavern; the First Murderer in the banquet scene, and the doctor in the sleep-walking scene. And, for fear that he might not have enough to do, the kind management gave him the direction of the stage! His weekly compensation for these labors was just $6.

Mudie later had an extensive répertoire experience with the famous Horniman players in Manchester. He was with them for four years, and played a really amazing list of parts, ranging from Eugene Marchbanks in Shaw's "Candida" to Gaffer Pierce, the ninety-year-old mad fiddler in Masefield's "Nan." When "Hindle Wakes" was first produced in London he played Christopher Hawthorne, the elderly father.

Mudie later played juvenile leads with Martin Harvey, essaying, among other parts, the character of Laertes in "Hamlet." In all he played more than 300 parts in England during his Shakespearean and répertoire engagements. He first came to this country three years and a half ago, and before going with Miss Taylor played in "The Guilty Man," with Walker Whiteside in "The Typhoon," with the late Sir Herbert Tree in "The Merry Wives of Windsor" (he was Justice Shallow in that production) and in "Magic." He is married to Beatrice Terry, a niece of Ellen Terry.

It might also be mentioned in passing that he has offered himself four times for enlistment in the British forces and has been rejected on each occasion. His cousin, Alan Mudie, pleasantly remembered as a juvenile musical comedy actor and dancer, was recently killed at the front.

THE Hippodrome has a new prima donna in the person of Ethel Hopkins, who succeeded Sophye Barnard a week or ten days ago. Miss Hopkins is the daughter of the late Colonel John D. Hopkins of Louisville, reputed to be the father of modern vaudeville. Colonel Hopkins, true to tradition, was opposed to his daughter going on the stage. But the daughter, hugging tradition not one whit less closely, was just as determined in the opposite direction. So, aiming high—she had operatic ambitions at this time—she began the cultivation of her high Cs to a disconcerting accompaniment of domestic gutturals.

After her graduation from St. Xavier's Convent in Chicago, where she had regularly shocked the good sisters by carrying off numbers of their pupils to attend Saturday matinées at one of her father's theatres, she again followed tradition by repairing to Europe for the final stages of her vocal training. She studied in London, Berlin, and Paris, her mentor in the last-named city being the famous d'Orsaire.

In London her path crossed the orbit of the late George Edwardes of the Gaiety Theatre, who urged her to effect an alliance with the lighter operatic forms. He even offered to star her in a musical comedy, but Miss Hopkins, preoccupied with more glittering aspirations, felt that this would be nothing less than an anti-climax. She recalls her action now with good-natured self-reproach. Not long after, however, she made her first stage appearance at the London Pavilion. Her success not only justified the Edwardes advice, but served to remove all doubts as to the congeniality of the lesser operatic medium.

Then began a vocal Odyssey which covered a good measure of the globe. Points in its itinerary were the Folies Bergères and the Olympia, in Paris; the Palace, the Pavilion, and the Alhambra, in London; the leading halls of Brussels, Berlin, Vienna, Glasgow, Dublin, Cape Town, and Johannesburg. Her selection by Lord Lonsdale to be one of those to appear at one of his famous London musicales affords an inkling of her professional standing abroad. On this occasion the King and Queen of Spain were the guests of honor.

Following her six years spent in other lands, Miss Hopkins returned to America the year before the war. She entered vaudeville, in the American branch of which her father's name is now historic, and it was there that she came within the purview of Charles Dillingham. The Hippodrome is an entirely new experience for Miss Hopkins, as diverting, she declares, as it is instructive, though hardly as exotic as singing before a Kaffir "compound" in South Africa.

REGINALD MASON, late man-about-town in "Daybreak" and at present the young lover in "The Pipes of Pan," probably is the only actor in the world who was thrown on the stage by an earthquake.

At the time of the San Francisco disaster Mr. Mason was breeding horses on a California ranch. The earthquake cost him everything he had.

Confronted by the necessity of re-establishing himself, he went first to Northern California, where he did a bit of surveying, and then, at the suggestion of a friend, came to New York and sought an engagement on the stage. His only experience had been as an amateur, but he didn't make much of that fact here. Instead, he held forth as a competent and experienced actor, and, strange as it may seem, got away with it.

His career on the stage has been marked by unusual success. His first part was that created by Charles Hawtrey in "The Messenger from Mars." Later he had engagements with Willie Collier, Mrs. Fiske, and Mme. Nazimova, and was with Laurette Taylor during her long run at the Cort in "Peg o' My Heart." Last year he appeared in "The Cinderella Man," and early this season scored a distinct personal hit in "Daybreak."

THE GREENWICH EXPERIMENT

THE Greenwich Village Theatre, the opening of which on Thursday night was responsible for a perceptible shifting of this city's theatrical centre, had its inception in the mind of Frank Conroy, its director. Conroy, contrary to a more or less general belief, was far from a fledgling during the time—two seasons ago, to be exact—when he was a member of the Washington Square Players. As a very young player he appeared in England with Sir Herbert Tree, the Manchester Players and the Benson Players, and before joining the Washington Square folk he acted for a time with a Shakespearean company in Boston.

Probably the hope of having a theatre of one's own is a part of the equipment of every young actor with ambitions, but Conroy's heart's desire, inasmuch as it was destined to be gratified, must be given serious consideration. With him from England had come Harold Meltzer, (son of Charles Henry Meltzer,) who had chanced to play with him in England in a number of companies. Meltzer alone shared Conroy's dream.

Conroy and Meltzer found themselves together again with the Washington Square Players. Conroy, although he gave himself in full to the Players' work and received much in return, naturally was far from having his ambitions gratified. When he felt that he was in a fair way to acquire a company of his own he withdrew from the Players, and with him, again, went Meltzer. Little theatres, of course, have one thing in common with big ones. A certain amount of capital is required to start them both, and the obtaining of the said capital was necessarily imperative before Conroy could embark on his enterprise with any feeling of artistic freedom.

The financial ways were fortunately cleared with the expenditure of only a tithe of the effort customarily required to bring about such a consummation, and Conroy and his fellow dreamers gathered one midnight in Boni's bookstore, just off Washington Square, to discuss a project which, visionary though it once had been, was beginning to assume reality. The Boni shop is a general meeting place for those who make the village their home, and from time to time divers well-known Washington Squarites happened along and took a hand in the meeting. One of those who definitely joined the enterprise on the occasion of this meeting was Barney Gallant, man about the world, who became the business manager of the organization.

It was decided at this meeting that one of the uptown theatres should be rented, but, when the renting conditions of Broadway entertainment palaces were inquired into, this plan was abandoned. After thinking matters over again, it was deemed wise to be of the village geographically, as well as spiritually, and at the end of several months of searching the site at Seventh Avenue and Fourth Street was settled upon. Ground was broken toward the end of last April, and a few months later Polly was induced to move her celebrated restaurant a little further west to Sheridan Square, just opposite the theatre.

Conroy declares that his theatre is to be handicapped in no way by traditions or customs, that it will be free to produce plays of any length and of any sort. He has managed to draw together a company of professionals who are on the stage for the love of the stage, and with these things to go on he has fond hopes of making the Greenwich Village one of the real dramatic cases of the land.

A FINANCIAL PLAY-CARPENTER

THE playwright whose talent and perseverance are such as to gain him the respectful attention of the producing managers and the subsequent public mounting of his work becomes at once and automatically a figure of public interest. But if by some necromancy he succeeds in so arranging matters that two of his pieces are projected upon the New York boards almost simultaneously, then interest changes to wonder and the gentleman suddenly finds himself a power in the community. Of such is the estate of Edward Childs Carpenter, at present enjoying the sensation of authorship of "The Pipes of Pan," produced at the Hudson Theatre on Tuesday, the 6th of this month, and of "The Three Bears," performed at the Empire Theatre on Tuesday, the 13th.

The rise of Mr. Carpenter, of course, has been in no wise meteoric and the present production of two plays from his pen marks merely the culmination of many years devoted to the writing of fiction and plays. For the past twelve years he has been writing plays and having them produced, on several occasions with important stars in the casts, but he was denied a really popular New York success until a little less than two years ago, when his comedy, "The Cinderella Man," flourished at the Hudson. As a writer of plays and novels Mr. Carpenter has been before the public since 1903, but his life has had another phase with which the public is less likely to be familiar.

For the fact remains that the author of such sentimental comedies as "The Cinderella Man," "The Pipes of Pan," and "The Three Bears" was chained for eleven years to the financial desk of The Philadelphia Inquirer." All of his many short stories, his four novels and many of his plays (including "The Cinderella Man") were written when he was The Inquirer's financial editor. It was not until November of 1915, when arrangements were under way for the production of "The Cinderella Man," (it began its engagement at the Hudson in January, 1916,) that Carpenter definitely relinquished his place as a financial editor and began to devote all his time to the writing of plays.

Carpenter's play-dabbling began in his teens. It continued throughout his twenties, the first half of which were spent in such unromantic surroundings as the office of the Secretary of a Newark steel plant, where he was an assistant to an assistant. He joined the staff of The Inquirer at 25—and remained on the paper for seventeen years. His early days on the sheet he spent as reporter, rewrite man, copy reader and in the discharge of the various other tasks which fall to the lot of the general newspaper worker, and he was placed in the financial department in the face of his forceful objections that he knew nothing about finance and cared less. His ultimate success as a financial editor was the result of no suddenly discovered flair for the commercial, but was achieved despite the natural handicap of a supreme unendowment for that sort of work.

The Inquirer never assumed command of his services until noon, and by arising early the eager Carpenter was enabled to spend the first four or five hours of the day in writing the sort of things that he wanted to write. During these years there flowed from his pen a constant stream of short stories and novels. Beginning with "The Chasm," a novel written in collaboration with Reginald Wright Kauffman in 1903, there followed "Captain Courtesy," "The Code of Victor Jallot," and "The Easy Mark," the last named published in 1912, by which time Carpenter had made sufficient progress as a playwright to justify him in abandoning fiction.

The first of his plays to have been produced was "The Dragon Fly," in the writing of which he had collaborated with John Luther Long. This was in 1905, and was followed the next year by a dramatization of his novel, "Captain Courtesy." It was not until 1909, however, that one of his plays reached New York. This was "The Barber of New Orleans," played by William Faversham. In 1911 he wrote "The Challenge" for Guy Bates Post, and followed it in 1913 with "The Tongues of Men," which served Henrietta Crosman as a vehicle on a country-wide tour.

"The Three Bears" antedates "The Pipes of Pan" in the writing, and probably was the last play for which Charles Frohman contracted. In April, 1915, just prior to the departure of the Lusitania, Mr. Frohman wrote to Mr. Carpenter's dramatic agent, Alice Kauser, and invited that playwright to concoct a comedy. Carpenter eagerly assented, and Mr. Frohman, in a letter written two days before the Lusitania sailed, set down the terms and added: "If these are satisfactory have Mr. Carpenter retain this letter as his contract. I never issue contracts."

With the death of Mr. Frohman the possibility of a Frohman production seemingly vanished. Carpenter said nothing about the matter to the executors of the Frohman estate, but nearly a year later Alf Hayman, in the course of an examination of C. F.'s papers, found a copy of the letter to Carpenter. The production of "The Three Bears" was the logical result.

"The Pipes of Pan" was not begun until "The Three Bears" had been completed, about which time Carpenter attended a performance of "A Kiss for Cinderella" and became interested in the work of Norman Trevor. He got into communication with that actor immediately and outlined to him the scenario of "The Pipes of Pan," which he had had in mind for a considerable period, and before he departed he had obtained Trevor's promise to create the principal part. Bearing in mind the difficulties of casting, Carpenter then went further, and recruited three other members of the company before he began the writing of the play. These were Janet Beecher, Reginald Mason, and Burton Churchill.

There will be a part for the last named, incidentally, in every play that Carpenter writes. Churchill played a bit in "The Barber of New Orleans" in 1909, momentarily transcending the star, and two years ago was the understanding father in "The Cinderella Man." Just now, therefore, he is appearing in his third Carpenter play.

WHAT NEWS ON THE RIALTO?

OUT in Chicago the temperamental Arnold Daly has been giving the theatrical situation a piquancy which it would not have possessed without him in these days of financial, and therefore managerial, depression. Mr. Daly has been acting at Cohan's Grand in Jesse Lynch Williams's comedy, "Why Marry?" produced by the Selwyns with a cast fairly weighted down with names—Daly, Nat Goodwin, Edmund Breese, Ernest Lawford, and three or four others of only slightly lesser importance.

As long as a month ago, when the piece was in rehearsal in this city under the direction of Roi Cooper Megrue, there were heard random rumors of the Daly insurgency. Then came an armistice, however, of sufficient duration to admit of the opening of the piece in Columbus on Nov. 1 and in Chicago a few days later. In the latter city "Why Marry?" is credited with being a distinct success, but, although distinct successes are few and far between in these times, not even that fact was potent enough to restrain Daly. On the morning after the opening he sent to each of the Chicago newspapers a neatly typed and formal announcement of his impending withdrawal from the cast.

The Selwyns, accordingly, have been anxiously seeking a prominent player to replace him when the comedy is brought to New York, but later developments indicate that the substitution will not be necessary. Somebody—haply the management, haply the actor—has thought better of it and Mr. Daly, until something else happens, will continue in the cast.

At the Hippodrome last Sunday night the Society of American Magicians took charge of matters and furnished an evening of magic as black and mystifying as can well be imagined. The baffling Houdini liberated himself from the Chinese torture cell, the great Keller caused a young woman to appear mysteriously in a locked and presumably vacant cabinet hung high in air, and Thurston and the others set at naught the theory of the corporeity of matter. The evening was a huge success.

Tuesday afternoon, as the curtain was about to rise on "Cheer Up," an attendant brought in a card to Mark Luescher, the Hippodrome manager.

"The President of the Society of American Magicians is outside," he explained. "He wants to know if he can get in to see the matinee."

Margaret Mower, erstwhile of the Washington Square Players, has turned up in Chicago, where she is appearing in some of Stuart Walker's Portmanteau plays, which are being given on odd afternoons at the Playhouse. That theatre, incidentally, is still occupied by the dramatization of Booth Tarkington's "Seventeen," and present indications are that it will be January or later before New York will be permitted to see it.

Introducing Elsie Janis, who is about to depart for London. Miss Janis has the floor:

"I have notified Alfred Butt of London that I will not star in 'Pom Pom,' as that is a typical Mizzi piece, and I do not care to play a boy rôle when the English have been so kind to me as a girl. I have closed by cable with Alfred de Courville to star in a production being written by Haddon Chambers. Alfred Butt does own the English rights to 'Pom Pom,' so much so that he suggests my reimbursing him for losses he may sustain through my refusing to play for him. He advises me that he has already paid down $2,000 for 'Pom Pom.' Henry Savage and Mr. Butt ought to get together, and, as for Mr. Savage's statement that Mizzi 'might duplicate her success in "Pom Pom" on the other side,' I can only say that I would like to see him try to present a star from Austria-Hungary in 'Pom Pom' or anything else in London. 'Twould be a pretty first night."

So saith Miss Bierbauer.

The way of the band of independent producers is smooth, so long as they take care to produce only failures, but if they are so indiscreet as to have a success on their hands their doom is sealed. The reference is to the group of Spaniards who have produced "The Land of Joy." They are at present being beseeched by several of the more prominent theatrical firms, and it seems probable that the management of the Spanish piece will soon pass into more professional hands. In that event "The Land of Joy" will move to a playhouse nearer the reputed centre of things, despite the fact that it is prospering gloriously at the Park.

Shows may come and shows may go—and a goodly number of them do both. The coming is a matter for much heraldry, but no press agent is so poor as to do their departure reverence. "Baa, Baa, Black Sheep," to be specific about it, has been laid peacefully away in the storehouse, and the number of public announcements to that effect has so far been exactly none.

Nance O'Neil is the latest recruit for the Australian stage, which from time to time draws our best players and holds onto them from one to five or more years. Miss O'Neil is at present appearing on the road in "The Wanderer," and will defer her departure for Australia until June. She will appear in numerous plays in Australia, "The Wanderer" among them.

After all, the title of the new Bernstein piece is not to remain "L'Elevation." The process of changing it to its English equivalent, "The Heights," is already under way, and marks the second instance in recent years of a change in a play's title while the piece was on the New York boards. Two seasons ago "Abe and Mawruss" became "Potash and Perlmutter in Society," and successfully withstood the shock.

It is reported on sound authority that David Belasco's latest acquisition is Jeanne Eagles, at present Mr. Arliss's leading woman in "Hamilton." Miss Eagles will join the Belasco forces next season.

THE NEW PLAYS

THE week ahead, with a quartet of new pieces on the schedule, will be only a trifle less productive than the weeks immediately preceding it. Two of the stage's most popular stars will return with new vehicles, and there will be a brace of musical shows in addition.

MADAM SAND—Tomorrow night at the Criterion Theatre.

Certainly one of the most interesting events of the season is the appearance of Mrs. Fiske in a play having for its central character France's great novelist, George Sand—Mme. Dudevant, in other words. Around the life of this erratic genius and her numerous love affairs Philip Moeller has written a comedy described as "a brilliant picture of the artistic and literary life of Continental Europe nearly a hundred years ago," a comedy which introduces, in addition to the novelist, such men as de Musset, Liszte, Chopin, and Lizst. Mrs. Fiske, it is reported, will indulge to the full in the author's reputed eccentricities, even appearing in male attire.

Mr. Moeller, it will be recalled, is one of the founders of the Washington Square Players and the author of three or four of their plays. Jose Rube, also once a Washington Squarer, will be in the supporting cast, and among the others will be Ferdinand Gottschalk, John Davidson, and Muriel Hope. Arthur Hopkins is the producer.

ODDS AND ENDS OF 1917—Tomorrow night at the Bijou Theatre.

Here is another musical revue somewhat along the lines of "Hitchy-Koo"—the work of Bide Dudley, the well-known man about Broadway; John Godfrey, and James A. Byrnes. Jack Norworth, turned actor-manager, will be much in evidence throughout the proceedings, and the others present will include Lillian Lorraine, Harry Watson, ex-Bickel and Watson; Laura Hamilton, Paul Frawley, and Morna Phillips.

THE KING—Tuesday night at the Cohan Theatre.

Leo Ditrichstein is the star of this newest offering, a comedy by G. A. Caillavet, Robert de Flers, and Emanuel Arene. Under its French title, "Le Roi," the piece had a long run in France eight or nine years ago, but circumstances have delayed its production here. Mr. Ditrichstein's rôle is that of a monarch of a mythical Slavic kingdom, and it is his amorous adventures in Paris with which the piece is concerned.

Among those who will be seen in Mr. Ditrichstein's support will be Frits Williams, A. G. Andrews, Robert McWade, Ben Johnson, John Bedouin, William Ricciardi, and Betty Callish.

THE STAR GAZER.—Thursday night at the Plymouth Theatre.

Music by Franz Lehár, book by Cosmo Hamilton, lyrics by Thomas C. Woodward—that is the tale of "The Star Gazer." The new piece is a romantic operetta, with scenes laid in England in 1820. Those featured in the cast will be John Charles Thomas, Beth Lydy and John T. Murray.

"Oh, Boy!" which has a record of nine or ten months behind it at the Princess, will be moved tomorrow night to the more spacious Casino, to succeed the late lamented "Kitty Darlin'." A new production will be made at the Princess in the course of a month or more.

Tonight's program at the Century Theatre will include Raymond Hitchcock, Leon Errol, Doyle and Dixon, Fanny Brice, Eddie Cantor, and the Six Brown Brothers, in addition to Bessie McCoy Davis and others of the resident Century entertainers.

IDLE GOSSIP OF BROADWAY AND ENVIRONS

NOTES OF THE LONDON STAGE

TO Americans, of course, the most interesting play in London is the new Barrie comedy, "Dear Brutus," which had its first performance at Wyndham's four weeks ago. It derives its name, as the cabled dispatches from London on the night of the première indicated, from the Shakespearean lines:

The fault, dear Brutus, is not in the stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

The best description of the play is given in The London Daily Telegraph:

"Quaint, whimsical, slily humorous, slyly pathetic, such are the epithets now kept standing for anything by Sir James Barrie. They must come in again. "Dear Brutus" is all of them by turn, and none of them very long at a time. It begins by being odd, merely odd and not vastly effective, and fills out an act with fancy and whim and satiric humor not of superlative quality. You feel that you have not got anywhere in particular, and you see no reasonable ground for belief that you are going to arrive. But with Sir James Barrie all things are possible. After some first-rate quiet fun in the next act, "all of a sudden," as was said of another kind of poetry, "you find yourself in heaven, heaven knows how." For it is poetry, this beautiful scene between father and daughter, charming with the tenderness and affection which are the best of real life put set in a glamour of fancy and dream. Then you come to a last act which gives you everything at once—whim and fun and tenderness, all of the best and most human. It is, formally, a fantasy translating itself back into reality, which produces as a rule moments of extreme boredom. But this is a little masterpiece, all in a flash delightfully comic and affecting, and true. * * *

"Dear Brutus is you and I and everybody, and to us all Sir James Barrie addresses a sermon on this text. We all think that we make a mess of things because fate is unkind, but really "the fault is in ourselves," and we are our own fate. How to prove it Sir James Barrie conjures up our old friend Puck, alias Lob-lie-by-the-fire, calls him plain Lob, and presents him as a queer old buck who has asked a party of folks more or less discontented with their lives, to come and stay with him for Midsummer Eve. On that night of wonder he sends them out into a mysterious wood which has suddenly sprung out of the void, and from which, as the country tale goes, no traveler returns.

"What happens? The lisping lady of high degree imagines herself the adoring wife of the knaviah butler who has become a rich financier. The philanderer who was finding an affinity in the sentimental minx not his wife is now married to her, but philandering all the same with the wife who was his but in dreamland is not. The amiable, uxorious old husband trips merrily with a whistle as a careless sprite. Last of all and best, the artist who was drinking himself to the dogs for refuge from a loveless and childless marriage is painting happily, with a delicious daughter to help him, and in an exquisite scene the feelings of all lucky fathers and daughters are told. Mark Twain used to say that he had put all he knew about boyhood into Tom Sawyer. Sir James Barrie has put the heart of fatherhood and daughterhood into this play, and though he has told us a good deal about fathers and mothers and children, he has never given us anything truer or more beautiful than this. But the daughter is only a dream daughter. The marriage was childless, and in the dream the unloving wife of reality is become a wretched waif, and when the real people pass away out of the dream the daughter is left alone in the gathering dark.

"When they come back to the house and wake up you have rare fun, fun shot with tenderness and kindly feeling. Some of them are going to be the better for their discoveries. Some of them are going to play the same old games. The artist and his wife have the best stuff in them, and they have found themselves and are to be 'underlings' no more. Off they go together, and behind them comes tripping the daughter of the dream."

"The Willow Tree" began its London engagement at the Globe on Oct. 22 under the management of Gilbert Miller, son of our own Henry Miller. In the Fay Bainter rôle is Renee Kelly, an American actress, who has become exceedingly popular in London. Mr. Walkley, in The London Times, greets it as "an agreeable soporific."

"The Thirteenth Chair" is another American play to reach the London stage lately, that melodrama having been offered at the Duke of York's on Oct. 17, with Mrs. Patrick Campbell in the rôle of Madame La Grange. The piece appears to have been well received, and Mrs. Campbell, who played the part with a French accent, is the recipient of particular praise.

Another recent production of interest is C. Haddon Chambers's new comedy, "The Saving Grace." To quote The Daily Telegraph:

"This is a real comedy, an event not so common as programs would have us believe. Living people move in it, and the fun is of what live people do and are. Laughter, like tears, ought to be for human things, and this party of Haddon Chambers is very human. Perhaps an austere taste might complain that his comedy has something too much of sentiment for the finest flavor. But it is a comedy of war time, and if we are to be content with laughter over the life which is being lived now we need to be a trifle sentimental too.

"As for the story, two sentences will tell you all that you need. The most amiable of penniless sportsmen, Blinn Corbett, was when the war broke out at the end of his ingenuity. His one asset being his comely wife's niece, he and she arranged to ensnare a young gentleman of wealth, whose mother at first took it badly and afterward discovered what charming people the Corbetts were and relented. Not much in that, you say, for three acts, and certainly not much which is fresh. But wait. Blinn Corbett is the most genial of ineffective sportsmen, the best of company, whether he is being "sly, sir, devlish sly," or delivering irrelevant orations, or running away from his wife's embraces, or merely a simple, honest fellow with a dignity of his own after all. And yet, good as he is, Blinn Corbett is not so good as his adorable goose of a wife, who began as a parson's daughter, married a Colonel who was a brute to her, ran away with Blinn and lived on nothing a year, and through it all preserved an ineffable simplicity, the morals of the country parsonage, a mind deliciously incoherent, and a disposition as sweet and gentle as you please. She is a treasure; she is a little masterpiece. The rest don't much matter. They are well enough, but they are subordinate. All of them nearly always talk excellently, not with too much effort, and yet with plenty of wit, real talk full of the humor which is nature."

Charles Hawtrey has the leading rôle, and the company also includes Ellis Jeffreys.

She Gives a Vivid Impersonation in the Role of the French-Canadian Heroine in "Tiger Rose," a Play Which Is Gradually Winning a Place for Itself as One of the Real Successes of the Season.

Sir Herbert Tree had expected to produce "The Great Lover" in London with himself in the leading rôle, and the death of that actor left the English production of the piece more or less an unsettled matter. It is now reported that none other than Antonio Scotti may eventually be induced to play Jean Paurel.

Lyn Harding's mysterious disappearance from the American stage is explained completely by his sudden bobbing up in London in a piece called "Wild Heather," which opened at the Strand about two weeks ago.

Since the news from London was last summarized in these columns "The Liars" has had a brief revival at St. James, where it has been succeeded by still another revival of "Ghosts." "The Off-Chance," a play by R. C. Carton, which had the appearance of a real success for a period, also has been produced and withdrawn, its successor at the Queen's Theatre being our old friend, "Brewster's Millions." The great successes, such as "Chu Chin Chow," "Theodore & Co.," "General Post," and several of the musical shows show no signs of decreasing popularity.

STARS IN THE NIGHT.

The sudden elevation of Alexandra Carlisle to stardom the other day because of her great personal success in "The Country Cousin" recalls several other instances of leading players being given sudden stellar rank during metropolitan runs.

The beautiful Edna May was such a one. The great vogue which she established for herself as the Salvation Army Girl in "The Belle of New York" at the Casino and the popularity which her singing of the famous "Follow Me" song enjoyed prompted her managers to capitalize her name, and it appeared one day emblazoned all over the front of the playhouse. Miss May continued to be a most successful star until she found time to marry a millionaire and retire from the stage.

Raymond Hitchcock, too, was made a star overnight by an appreciative management after he had scored a huge success in the title rôle of "King Dodo" at Daly's. Prior to that time he was best known in New York as the leading comedian of the popular-priced comic opera company which Henry W. Savage had established at the American Theatre.

Elsie Ferguson was another actress who first became a star after she had registered a substantial success in a play in which she had appeared without any undue preliminary flourish of trumpets. The piece was Channing Pollock's "Such a Little Queen."

THE average film fan, viewing a typical made-in-America product, will derive a double amount of amusement therefrom by endeavoring to anticipate the state of mind of the Englishman who chances to see that picture in one of the movie "halls in London, Manchester, or points adjacent. We are now supplying England with a vast quantity of motion pictures and in these circumstances it is inevitable that the Englishman who never has been in America and who bases his imaginings upon what the American films tell him, would begin to construct for himself a strange and eerie land.

Something of this sort is done in a recent issue of The Manchester Guardian, where a writer views America and American films through English eyes. The article is in part as follows:

"No doubt if one spoke American as fluently as one speaks, say French, no mental strain would be involved, for the occasional letterpress thrown on the screen might then fulfill its object and explain the accompanying pictures. As it is, although the words appear generally to be English, I have to wait in most cases for the picture to explain the accompanying letterpress. I defy any one, without a long course of photoplays, to translate at sight such a sentence as 'A potential vampire sells hot dogs.' Experience might enable one in this instance to guess that a future adventuress is beginning her career by selling sausages-and-mashed; but only a complete movie glossary would clear up the remark, 'Sure, boy, you can wrangle the chuck,' which, I gather, is meant for a compliment to the boy's cooking. And what, pray, is an 'inoffensive nester'? What, for that matter, is an offensive nester? Not a cuckoo, I hasten to assure the educationist who revels in the nature-study film; for this expression occurs in a cowboy drama. From internal evidence I suggest hopefully, though not with confidence, that it means a peaceably minded settler—if there is such a phenomenon in the wild West. * * *

"A war picture appeared the other day in The Manchester Guardian showing how American soldiers are trained to scale walls and other obstacles. This must have puzzled any one who is familiar with the drama of the screen, from which one has learned to suppose that in America, where the scene of most photoplays is laid, the average citizen spends a considerable part of his time in scaling walls, swarming up rainpipes, sprinting down roofs at an acute angle, and dropping a thousand feet or so from a telephone wire into a passing motor car beneath. To be 'featured' in any five-act Triangle or Golden Rooster photoplay ought to be all the training an American requires for the exigencies of war; and if the screen is really expressive of life in America, a week spent in a seaside hotel there would give any man all the practice he needs in the use of firearms, the intricacies of secret service, and the resources of modern transport.

"You never walk in a photoplay. On the rare occasion when you use your own feet to scurry as if in a perpetual walking race, but the rest of the time you use the parcel lift of the moving staircase (provided that it is moving in the opposite direction to that in which you wish to go) or you allow the cold douche in the bathroom to shoot you through the wall or the floor or the window into somebody else's private room, where you are not wanted. (In a 'comic' you never by any chance stay in your own hotel bedroom.) Everybody in filmland carries a revolver—or 'gun,' as it is curiously called—which never seems to kill any one, except in a drama of love and passion, when it invariably removes the superfluous person (in whatever direction it happens to be pointed) and produces an American trial, which looks like a board meeting, at which the innocent hero is condemned while the guilty adventuress rolls her eyes about pending the moment when she, too, is brought before the board meeting after an exciting chase in a motor car. Sooner or later in every photoplay there is a chase in a motor car, which frequently outdistances an express train, while a pursuing bicycle outdistances both. I have once seen this chase take place in a draper's shop—I mean 'store'—when the car plunged through all the several departments, affording endless opportunities for humor of a broad type, of which every advantage was taken.

"Lest I be misunderstood, let me say at once that the films delight me in spite of, not because of, obvious defects. There is no occasion for the 'comic' to be a vulgar 'comic.' I have heard far more genuine laughter roused in a picture-house by a really funny scene than by a vulgar one. Similarly, a photoplay need not be dull because it points a decent moral and accentuates the good and not the evil in human nature. One of the best detective stories I have seen depicted was one in which the girl 'crook' turned over a new leaf and outwitted the detective, who wanted her to remain in her old life because she was useful to him. Children do not like stories with a bad moral because they have a bad moral, but because they are good stories. And they will only like the educational film if it is presented to them as a substitute for a lesson. A film of plant life will be engrossing, for instance, in comparison with a botany lesson. But the educationist who thinks it is going to take the place of a glorious medley of horses and mountain gullies and buffaloes and 'inoffensive nesters' has clearly never known what it is to long to be a cowboy. Knowing how intensely annoyed I should feel if, after paying my one-and-threepence, I were confronted with the history of a grain of wheat, I sincerely hope that the proposed board of censors, when constituted, will not include any of those killjoy persons whom we call in Filmland 'the vestal virgins of uplift.'"

The Goldwyn Company, which continues to make perceptible strides on its way to the top, has added R. A. Walsh, late of the Fox forces, to its directing staff. Also, although the time for publication of the fact has not yet arrived, they have acquired the services of one of the most prominent of all film actresses, a woman whose début in films a few years ago was the occasion for countrywide comment.

Edward Childs Carpenter's play, "The Cinderella Man," is being made into a film by Goldwyn with Mae Marsh in the rôle created by Phoebe Foster. It will be a pre-Christmas release.

The newest in William Fox's series of films for youngsters is "Treasure Island," made with the Fox 6-year-olds, Francis Carpenter and Virginia Lee Corbin in the parts.

HENRI BERNSTEIN AND "L'ELEVATION"

The Story of How the Playwright Justified the Production of His Work at the Paris Comedie Francais.

HENRI BERNSTEIN, whose "L'Elevation" Grace George brought to this country last week, has managed to combine with his literary exhortation in behalf of his country a definite and actual participation in the actual fighting of the war. Those who have followed Bernstein's career in France will remember that the production of his "Après Moi" at the Comédie Française, in 1912, aroused a storm of protest from the anti-Semitic group of Frenchmen led by Léon Daudet. It was the first of Bernstein's plays to receive this national recognition, and Daudet and his following were incensed that such an honor as a presentation in the Comédie Française should be awarded a Jew.

Ostensibly, however, the protest was based on the fact that Bernstein was technically a foreigner, being a naturalised Rumanian. "Shall France award such distinction," said Daudet, "to an outsider, a man who has not even served his term of military service for the State?"

At the hearing on the case, which had resolved itself into one of those frantic public scandals with which France was exciting herself previous to the war, Bernstein arose in his own defense, and, in a speech which had all the elements of drama which he had ever put in the most impassioned speech of the most wronged husband in his most triangular play, he declared:

"It is true that I was born in Rumania. It is true that I was naturalized too late to serve in the National Army. But, on the day when France is attacked, I will be the first to offer myself in her defense!"

And he did. In the Summer of 1914 he volunteered for service. Unusual as this was for an author of any land, it was particularly so for a French author, for the French Government has a sentimental bias in favor of the lives of the country's famous literary men, and makes a point of assigning them, so far as possible, to bullet-proof positions, both for their own sakes and for France. It would have been perfectly within the code, then, for Bernstein to have accepted the protection which the Government offered, and to have remained at home to write for the Paris Lodge of the Vigilantes. Instead, he was sent to Saloniki with the flying corps, where he distinguished himself for bravery, and, at the same time, began "L'Elevation."

The connection between the name and the nature of his service was not accidental nor in the nature of a pun. It was the "elevation" which he experienced when flying above the lines at Saloniki, which, according to his own account, gave him the inspiration for a drama based on the corresponding spiritual elevation which the war has effected in so many instances, raising men from the earth to the heights, and giving them in one tremendous sweep a comprehension of the spiritual landscape about their lives.

Before he had finished his play he was injured and sent to Italy to recuperate. While in the hospital at Brundisi he wrote the last act, the scene laid in a similar hospital, and gave to the character of Louis De Gonols the exposition of his theory of "L'Elevation" through war.

From the hospital in Italy he returned to Paris in June of this year with his finished play, where it was immediately produced at the Comédie Française. The French public seized upon it as the one exalted piece of work produced by a French writer since the war began, and it is still being played there with great success. And so far there has been no protest from the Dau-det party.

SOMETHING ABOUT PINERO

PROOF that a foreign play can be produced in these parts without the accompaniment of a constant stream of transatlantic letters from the author—it is Shaw, of course, who is the foremost exponent of the letter writing system—is contained in the case of "The Gay Lord Quex." The letters of Sir Arthur Wing Pinero, at the time a production of one of his plays is pending in a distant clime, are infrequent, brief, and businesslike. Only once in the correspondence with John D. Williams, which preceded the present production of "The Gay Lord Quex," did the playwright turn aside even momentarily from the business in hand. On that occasion he wrote:

"What you tell me is of great interest. Of Miss Margaret Illington as an actress I am a great admirer, and I have the additional pleasure of knowing her in private life. She should give a good account of Sophy. Some of the other names, too, you mention are familiar to me.

"By this time your production will have taken place, and I look forward to receiving a report from you. Not altogether for selfish reasons, as, I hope you will believe, I wish you and my old friend Drew a substantial success with the venture.

"I am not going to do my new piece—a light, simple comedy—till the early part of next year. There are difficulties in getting a suitable cast, and, beyond this, the inducement to risk new work in London at the present moment is a small one. The people, not having much else to do, are inclined to go to the theatre, but the air raids deter them. The moment they recover from one shock, they get another, and so we drag on. The only theatres which consistently do well are those where musical comedy is being acted. At the Adelphi Theatre here, where a musical version of an old farce of mine, "The Magistrate," is being performed, they played during a recent week of almost continuous bombardments to the nightly average of about £300."

It is not laxness in the matter of detail, but rather a strict attention to it, which renders it unnecessary for Pinero to send instructions when one of his pieces is to be presented. The scripts of Pinero are models of stage direction. Of all playwrights he is perhaps the most precise, and this fact evidences itself from the very beginning of the process of writing a play. It is with the utmost precision and only after a solid year or even two years of reflection that Pinero will take up a pen to lay the foundation of a play. Then the work proceeds with all the deliberation of an architect laying the groundwork of a building, and each successive step, once taken, never is retaken. He has each of his plays privately printed, not typewritten, before production, and he is so sure of himself when he finishes an act that he sends it immediately to the printer, knowing that it will require no revision.

John D. Williams describes Pinero as "short in stature, inclined to stoutness; smoking cigarettes interminably—never without one between his lips for five consecutive minutes—and, for some reason best known to himself, always wearing his gloves; striding nervously about during rehearsals of any of his plays; a stickler for details; insisting to a hair's breadth on the actors' positions, their movements, inflections—above all, syllabic perfection in speaking his text; treating his performers like a group of children; taking Sir George Alexander through a part like a youngster; glowering at the players under bushy and autocratically puckered eyebrows."

O. P. Heggie, in discussing the various English playwrights upon an occasion last year, declared that Pinero was by a wide margin the least popular of all among actors, a fact which is readily understandable in view of the foregoing description of his methods. Mr. Heggie's judgment is confirmed by Mr. Williams, who further describes the Pinero method at rehearsals. His custom is to sit at a table in the centre of the stage with a stenographer at his left and another at his right, both of whom he keeps busy taking down notes of the rehearsal. Before the next rehearsal everybody in the cast is furnished a typewritten copy of the additions, corrections, or suggestions that may have occurred to the author with regard to his or her part.

Pinero is relentless in his insistence upon the carrying out of these instructions. One of the numerous tales of Pinero at rehearsals has to do with a certain actor who was floundering about at rehearsal over lines that should have been long since memorized. Brought to book, the actor, with amazing assurance, remonstrated: "I know my lines, Mr. Pinero; I really do." Pinero answered: "Yes, yours; but not mine." Pinero, as is generally known, began his theatrical career as an actor, but not even the remembrance of those days, if he still remembers them, has served to soften his attitude toward actors.

Pinero is fondest of London during what is known as "the season," and of all places in London he likes best the Garrick Club. When the London season is over he leaves town for a little place in the country, about twenty miles from London. His holiday season in London has been devoted to playgoing, clubs and a few gatherings with friends, but during all that time he has been thinking out plays. By the time he has reached the country he has usually evolved a scenario and is ready to put it to paper. The task is systematically approached. He never works in the morning; that portion of the day is given to outdoor exercise. He rarely works in the afternoons. After 6 o'clock he really begins, and keeps it up without interruption until 11, when he has a light supper and goes to bed, to take up the same routine the next day. He usually follows the production of a serious play by turning to the writing of a comedy or farce, and sometimes, when the strain of writing a serious work is telling too heavily on him, he will drop it temporarily and turn to formulating a comedy.

Margaret Illington as Sophy Fullgarney.

In his relations with his friends Pinero is described as a man of liberality of thought and deed, an instance of his generosity being his consent to the playing of "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" here during a short tour of the Kendals, when it was quite evident that the presentation of the play on a brief tour would result in a considerable loss of potential profits. One of Pinero's closest friends today is Barrie, and the two men, despite their many ways of difference, have the greatest fondness and admiration for each other. The admiration of Pinero took the form of a public tribute in "Mid-Channel," when, with "Peter Pan" as his theme, he caused the following passages to be interpolated:

ZOE—I've been to the theatre every night this week and supped out afterward. They've opened such a ripping restaurant in Jermyn Street. You haven't seen the new play at the St. Martin's, then?

MRS. PIERPONT—No.

ZOE—I'll take you. We'll make up a party. I'll tell Lenny Ferris to get seats.

ETHEL—Good business!

MRS. PIERPONT—Ethel!

ZOE—It's all about children—kiddies. There are the sweetest little tots in it. Two especially—a tiny, round-eyed boy and a mite of a girl with straw-colored hair—you feel you must clamber on the stage and hug them. You feel you must!

MRS. PIERPONT—Aren't there any grown-ups?

ZOE—Oh, yes; they bore me.

ETHEL—I was reading the story to you, mother—

ZOE—The story's no account—it's the kiddies. The man who wrote the thing must be awfully fond of children. I wonder whether he has any little 'uns. If he hasn't, it's of no consequence to him; he can imagine them. What a jolly gift! Fancy! To have the power of imagining children—bringing them to life! Just by shutting the door, and sitting down at your writing table, and saying to your brain: "Now, then! I'm ready for them!"

THE DREAM OF THE ORIENT

The romance and the mystery of the East have ever intoxicated and thrilled; the East of echoing silver bells, of beautiful women with faces hidden behind perfumed veils; of riches undreamed and jewels rare; of silks and satins and spices and Grecian wines; of bazaars laden with cloth of gold; of camels bending their knees to unload the burdens from Cathay and Nineveh and Egypt; these and all the wonders of beautiful Bagdad, the jewel of Persia of a thousand years ago, are reincarnated again in the superb and bewildering musical tale of the East, William Elliott, F. Ray Comstock and Morris Gest's magnificent, gorgeous and glittering production of

EAST SIDE WOES OF HOOVER CANVASSER

Difficulty of Making Foreign-Born Understand What Food Cards Mean —Only One Refused to Sign.

By MARY G. TOWNSEND.

A FEW days ago I received a telephone call from a settlement worker friend beseeching me to come quick and help in the Hoover food canvass. Accordingly, I journeyed to the lower east side, to that vast district east of Chatham Square. Every one at the settlement was scuttling about with a harassed expression, and I heard vague murmurs all about, such as "Only two shut the door in my face yesterday," "I got only six families," "My dear, not one of them spoke English!" From these and other scraps I surmised that they were leaving the Hoover food cards all over a huge area and having rather poor luck generally. Hence, when my friend showed me their district, only four or five square blocks, I was rather surprised, and inwardly made up my mind that I had come just in the nick of time. For, methought, if all one has to do is to get the housewife to sign this little card agreeing to abide by food economy regulations, why, I could do the entire district in a day, and here they sit tearing their hair because, in truth, they have only a week for it!

My friend continued her explanations. It seemed they hunted in pairs. Ah, that explained it! Of course, they loitered along, and wasted much valuable time in idle chatter. I should be strictly businesslike. Nevertheless, I was a bit relieved to find that my friend intended going out with me on my "route." I determined to observe how she went about getting the first signature; then, of course, I could go on alone.

We started off, armed to the teeth with signature cards, window cards, Yiddish cards, Italian cards, a few English cards, and pencils in every pocket. We walked toward the river, and as we entered the last house on the block, a mere wreck of a building clinging to its neighbor as if afraid a big wave might wash it forever into the East River, my friend said, "I'll take the top floor and you take the next. I'll meet you at the door when we finish."

Then she was gone, up the most rickety, filthy staircase I had ever seen. Left alone in the dingy hall, I beat upon the nearest door. No response. I tried the next one, which was partly open. My knock opened it and I stepped into a small room in which sat an Italian woman sewing on coats and nursing a baby. She looked up apathetically as I entered and motioned me to a chair, at the same time intimating that she did not speak English. Another baby appeared, crawling out from under a bed.

"Do you read?" I asked, and naturally, as she knew no English, she shook her head. Then I waved the Italian "Credo da Guerre" under her nose. She took no interest in it, but merely murmured, "leetle boy," and nodded toward the door. Oh, joy, a boy of about 10 years. He grinned at me and I promptly started to explain. When I had finished I suggested that he tell his mother about it and ask her to sign the card.

"I didn't get yer," he remarked without interest, and sat down.

Then the father came in and I tried him. "For da solda?" he questioned. I explained that we were trying to release food to send to the soldiers. He listened with an interested look, but I realized it was mere desert air when he answered, "I no can go. I broka da foot." He felt them both critically, and finally selected the broken one to show me.

Then, like an angel from heaven appeared a girl of about 15. "What's da row, heh?" she inquired.

Eagerly I explained it all to her and pressed the cards into her hand. She took an Italian one and read it aloud. Then they all chattered at once, and the two babies cried.

At the door appeared swiftly, one after another, six women, who broke out in what seemed shrill protestation. They waved their arms about; they grabbed the cards from each other. The man snatched a half-eaten loaf of bread from the table and a pan from the stove and waved them at me while he delivered an oration about something, I knew not what.

I stood my ground, however, and in a few minutes the girl emerged from the midst and said, "Sure, dey all sign," and handed me seven precious cards. I murmured my thanks and fled. At the door I found my friend, looking most dejected. Poor soul, she had had no luck at all, for I had cornered the entire household.

We continued on our rounds. The next few houses proved fairly easy, as one or two in each spoke English and all wanted to sign. On the first floor of one was a plumber's establishment. In we went and found two semi-dark rooms back of the shop. In the first room, a tiny place with no window and unbelievably dirty, we came upon a young woman, weighing perhaps 300 pounds. She was yelling shrilly at a man in the shop about a lock. When she had settled him to her satisfaction she turned her attention to us. We explained our mission and showed her the card.

"What the —— do I care for the Government?" she shouted. "I want cheap food. Always money, money, money everywhere. I want food, that's what I want."

After much argument and long debate the woman finally signed, but she was still swearing energetically at us, the Government, and her baby, when we left, enthroned on a cribful of pillows.

On our rounds we met mostly Italians. Some refused to have anything to do with us. They did not shut us out. They merely said "No Ingleesh" and went about their work. If we continued talking, as we generally did, they seemed totally oblivious to our existence. On the other hand, there were those who would go into peals of glee over our attempts to make them understand. Two or three of them would gather about us and discuss us with much merriment and then try to explain the joke to us. In these cases we generally found one who could read. Then it would dawn on them what it all meant, and amid more jokes they would sign the pledges and send us on our way feeling much more light-hearted.

As we were entering one house a voice behind us called out: "Hey there. Come here. Come here and I'll knock your block off!" We turned and beheld a very dilapidated old woman. "Don't you go in there," she ordered. "Who do you want, anyway? Who do you want in that house? I'll knock your block off, I will, if you go in there."

We replied that we wanted every one and explained the pledge to her. Her tactics changed at once. "God bless ye both, God bless yez, but don't go in there; not in that house, God bless ye." She tottered off down the street and left us standing in the dark hall of the tenement with her sinister warning. We looked at each other a moment and then decided to try it. We climbed the six long flights of stairs and knocked at the top floor. It proved to be just a house of perfectly nice Italians, all of whom signed the cards and seemed most intelligent about it.

The most depressing part is to think you have finished a house and then to come to a three-foot crack in the wall and see, perhaps, two more tenements built in the back yard of the first. They are always dingy places and, as a rule, full of the very poorest and most ignorant. In one of these all the inhabitants thought we were trying to sell them bonds or get their money away from them. Their only reply was, "No money, no dolla week, no money." We finally succeeded in getting them to see what it all meant when some of the children came in from school and explained in their own dialect.

One rear tenement we came upon had been abandoned, or, probably, condemned. We found it back of what had once been a private house. It was an old wooden structure, with one or two shutters still clinging to its battered window frames. We climbed up on the cellar door to look in, and saw a large room with one of the loveliest carved mantels I have ever seen. The whole interior was painted in that ghastly green that predominates in tenement districts, but even that could not hide its graceful lines. The house was just a poor old relic of the forgotten grandeur of a century ago in that neighborhood.

It was rather a shock to find that the front steps of the house continued straight up inside with no hall at all. Just a steep flight of stairs not more than two feet wide and flanked by two solid walls. We stumbled up them to the first landing, off which opened two doors, and then up a second flight, even steeper, which wound around and led to another landing with two more floors. We got no answer to our knocks from either door. We peered through the keyhole! The back room was evidently vacant, but the front was not. We could see a small low room with sloping ceiling, barren of any decoration, a broken chair and a dirty, tumbled bed with a human being in it. We tried the door and knocked again, but could get no response.

We felt rather awed and went hastily downstairs. My friend knocked on the front door and disappeared rapidly within, leaving me standing alone, so I knocked on the other door. It was opened a crack and an old, old woman gave me one look, said "Get out of here," and slammed the door. I stood still a moment, then knocked again. Again she said "Get out." So I stood and waited. Presently she opened the door, very quietly, gave a slight start at seeing me still there and said: "What do you want? Go 'way. Why do you trouble a poor old blind woman like me?"

I told her we wanted to help her, not trouble her, and that we were trying to make it easier for her to get food and that we needed her to help us, too. She listened while I tried to placate her, but when I paused for breath she said, "Who the devil are you anyway, Hillquit?" I hastily denied any such identity, and told her that this was bigger than a city movement, that it had President Wilson back of it.

"President, ye say? Sure, I'm the president meself. I got a country of me own and I'm president of it. You don't get me that way. President indade! And how much does your President pay you to come troublin' a poor old blind woman?" she asked me scathingly.

I explained the volunteer system and our desire to help the poor. "A very charitable woman indade ye must be," she went on scornfully, "and ye can take your charity to some one else. I don't need your help nor no one else's. I don't want it." She was dressed in rags and a peep over her shoulder revealed a tiny room with only the barest necessities for life.

"Wouldn't you like to pay less for your food?" I ventured.

"I don't pay for my food. I get it free," she announced.

"You're very lucky. I wish I could."

"I'm a politician, I am, and I live off graft like all the rest. Free graft, that's how I get my food. Now you've found out enough about me and you can go." I went and she watched me as I knocked on the opposite door, behind which my friend had vanished. The old woman called shrilly:

"Yes, go in there. Go after that couple. They need help, they're poor, go after them." I went in and found my friend with a neat young Irish woman and her husband in much merriment over my attack from the old woman.

"Who is she?" my friend asked. "Does she drink?"

"Drink is it?" came in rasping accents from across the hall. "Aye, if it's drinkin' you're after, that pair in there can do all the drinkin' ye want."

They laughed good-naturedly and told us her story. Her husband and son had both been killed in a fire and she lived alone. A niece, next door, looked after her and saw that she had everything she needed. We tried her again and finally "jollied" her into a good humor, but of the fifty or more families we visited that day she alone refused to sign.

WHY ART WORKS NOW COST SO MUCH

War Millionaires of Europe, Competing for Masterpieces, Chief Explanation of Record-Breaking Prices

EUROPEANS as well as Americans have made money out of the war, and it is these new millionaires of Europe who are partially responsible for record-breaking prices for works of art, said Edward Robinson, Director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in speaking the other day of the difficulties of keeping a museum in wartime up to a normal state of efficiency.

Not only are prices of such works of art as find their way into the market high, but there is a remarkable scarcity of good works of art of any kind, a fact which is a great surprise to buyers who believed that the result of the war would be to throw art treasures of many kinds on the market at bedrock prices. On account of these conditions and the general high cost of living which affects museums as well as individuals, Mr. Robinson finds this is a season of many difficulties.

"The late J. Pierpont Morgan was considered a royal buyer," said Mr. Robinson; "he did not hesitate at the cost for things that he wanted, but the prices he paid were moderate in comparison with those which are asked and obtained now.

"The late John G. Johnson, who was known all over Europe as a quick buyer, said before his death last Spring that since the war began he had hardly anything offered him that was worthy of consideration, and this is the common report. This scarcity with the new buyers has boosted prices to a surprising degree. This was shown in the recent sale of the famous Hope collection in London. In the collection were 155 Greek vases which, according to The London Times, were expected to bring a total of about £5,000. They actually brought nearly £17,000.

"A well-known Italian dealer who arrived in this city last Spring reported an unusually successful season. When surprise was expressed at this, with no Americans traveling in Italy, he said: 'Ah, but you must remember that in my country there are also people who have been making money and with them we have done a very good business.' Public auction sales in various European centres have shown by the keen competition that this was not only a dealer's movement. That so few fine works of art have been put on the market since the war has created very general surprise. Not nearly as many first-class works of art have been put on the market during the three years of the war as during the three years previous to it. This is particularly so with regard to high-class paintings."

The Museum shows a reduction in the increase in the number of new exhibits not only from the difficulty in purchasing, but because of the danger of transportation, and all its purchases of the last few years on the Continent are being held and also the results of the Museum's excavations in Egypt. Funds are also cut down because of the increased cost of maintenance with no additional appropriation from the city.

"Although the Museum does not eat," said Mr. Robinson, "its employes do, and, last Winter, all receiving salaries of $1,200 or under were voted a bonus of 5 per cent. for 1916 and 10 per cent. for the current year. The cost of supplies for our regular work has increased by leaps and bounds. Coal is the most striking example, and we have before us now the prospect of a $10,000 increase in that one item alone. It is difficult to get some materials that we wish at any price. The dearth in textile materials not made by our manufacturers has come at a particularly hard time for us. We now have a new wing nearly ready for occupancy; we are rearranging some of our older galleries where the wall coverings have become faded and there are so few materials from which to make a choice and the prices are so high that we have been able to obtain them for only a few rooms. Some of the old wall coverings have been painted over to obtain the effect desired. Even for the exhibition cases which we make in our own shops there has been great difficulty in getting hold of metal for their framework."

Twenty-nine employes of the Museum are in war service. Some of those who have been called were valuable department men.

Good Old Butter.

Fifteen or sixteen years ago a crock of butter escaped from captivity, falling into the well on the Pierce place, near Auxvasse, where it was forgotten until the other day, when, while cleaning out the well, J. Ed Mann found it. A hard crust had formed over the top of the butter, but Mr. Mann told the Review that when this was taken off the butter seemed as fresh and as yellow as when it took a tumble.—Kansas City Times.

CLEMENCEAU AGAIN PREMIER OF FRANCE

Sensational Career of the Man Who Has Upset More Ministries Than He Can Remember—Once Lived Here.

FOR the second time in his sensational career, Georges Clemenceau is Premier of France. But this is the first time, in all his record as a "destroyer" of other men's power, that he has himself replaced the Premier whom he overthrew.

Some time before Clemenceau was first made Prime Minister of France—he was 65 years old when, in 1906, that honor came to him—a friend asked him how many Ministries he had destroyed. He replied pleasantly that he was quite unable to remember.

Many men have risen and fallen from power since then, and Clemenceau's hand has lost none of its cunning. The "tombeur des Ministères," they have called him for years in Paris—the overthrower of Ministries. And now, after a period of comparative quiet, at the age of 76, he has emerged from something that must have seemed to him almost obscurity, and wrecked a Cabinet again. It was Clemenceau who began the Parliamentary attack against "Bolo-ism," and it was on that issue that M. Painlevé fell.

A master of epigram, Clemenceau has made his phrases as much feared as his arguments. In his adventurous political career he has also won a number of sobriquets for himself. "The Overthrower of Ministries" has been the most persistent of his nicknames. "The Tiger" is another title that has been bestowed upon Clemenceau. "The kingmaker" has been a phrase frequently used in reference to his career, but that one is not exactly descriptive, for he has unmade rulers more often than he has advanced them. Other nicknames are "The Stormy Petrel of French Politics" and the "Red Indian." And there was a time years ago in France when his political enemies cast at him the epithet, "Yankee Schoolmaster," in allusion to his residence and activities in the United States.

Clemenceau's father was imprisoned by Napoleon III. at the time of the coup d'etat that destroyed the Second Republic, and the son has been a true child of the Revolution. It is characteristic of him that he supported General Boulanger as long as he believed him to be working in the interests of the republic, and that when the "Man on Horseback" was seen to be scheming for the return of the Bourbons, Clemenceau rose up and drove him from power.

Before he was 20 Georges was thrown into prison for shouting "Vive la République!" on the streets of Paris, in the midst of the celebration of one of the imperial anniversaries. He served his term in jail, and then, practically an exile, he came to America.

Between 1865 and 1869 he lived in this country, chiefly in New York and in Stamford, Conn. He had been educated as a physician, and it was as a medical practitioner that he established himself on West Twelfth Street and became known in the neighborhood about Washington Square. Before he left France he had made the acquaintance of William E. Marshall, the artist who made the famous engraving of Lincoln, and it was as his friend, and indeed upon his invitation, that the young physician came to New York.

But Georges Clemenceau, though his father had been a physician before him and generations of his family had followed that profession, was not successful as a doctor of medicine. He was not deeply interested in his calling. It is true that his university thesis for his doctor's degree was not only considered an important work at the time, but was still consulted as authoritative fifty years after he had written it. But, even as a student in Paris, young Clemenceau had found time to inform himself carefully on political questions and to contribute controversial papers to the political reviews. In New York he gravitated naturally toward the study of social and political conditions. And he drew his income not from the practice of his profession, but largely from the letters about things in America that he sent to the papers at home. Clemenceau wrote back to Paris that his first impression of the Americans was that they had "no general ideas and no good coffee."

Whatever he thought of our coffee, Clemenceau did study our ideas, our conditions of living, our government, and our language. He had had an academic knowledge of English when he left France; it soon became idiomatic. He traveled, too, visiting the Middle West, and going as far South as Richmond. But he could not travel further in the South, he said, because the condition of that section of the country, just defeated in the civil war, was too sad for him to contemplate. He returned to New York, was a constant reader at the Astor Library, and made a number of good friends, especially Eugene Bushe, a lawyer, who was his neighbor on Twelfth Street. When Clemenceau failed to build up a medical practice and the money that he got from France proved insufficient, Bushe introduced him to the mistress of a girls' boarding school, a Miss Aiken, who employed him as teacher of the French language and literature in her "young ladies" seminary" at Stamford.

There Clemenceau translated the works of John Stuart Mill into French, was an indefatigable student of American politics, became known as a serious scholar, and surprised his acquaintances by falling in love with one of his young pupils and marrying her. It was not, however, until Miss Mary Plummer of Springfield had completed her course of studies at Miss Aiken's school and gone to New York to visit an uncle, that Dr. Clemenceau made known his personal interest in her. They were married in June, 1869; and early in 1870, he left the school where he had taught for two and a half years, and went back, with his wife, to France. After some years Mrs. Clemenceau obtained a divorce. Clemenceau married again.

One of the treasures of the New York Library is a copy of Clemenceau's thesis on anatomy, with the writer's signature on the title page, "Presented to the Astor Library by the author, G. Clemenceau," with the date, "New York, Oct. 19, 1867." One thing that he said in those days has been frequently quoted—that France would some day be a republic, and that he, the radical, might yet be its President.

Throughout the Franco-Prussian war and the siege of Paris Clemenceau was Mayor of the district of Montmartre. One of his duties during the siege was to see that 150,000 men were properly fed. Another was to look after thousands of refugees. He was also responsible for large amounts of money, and they tell a story that, foreseeing the accusations against any one's honesty that might be made in those trying days, he took the precaution of engaging an expert accountant to "check up" and make public his use of every sou of public funds. At the end of the war he did all he could to gain "home rule" for Paris, and then found himself the enemy of the Commune.

In 1871 he was elected to the General Assembly, and it is interesting to note that he was opposed to a treaty of peace. From 1871 to 1875 he was a member of the Paris Municipal Council, of which he became President, and in 1876 he was elected member from Montmartre in the Chamber of Deputies, where he soon became leader of the Radicals. From the outset of his career in the French Parliament he was the bitter opponent of the Royalists, and soon became known for his eloquence and independence of action. Men could not predict the action of Clemenceau. He was independent even in his radicalism, and he followed no leader but his own principles. They called him the undisciplined vandal in those early days when he was making a reputation as an upsetter of other men's careers.

His political power was increased by his journalistic activities. In 1880 he founded La Justice, the great daily paper of which he became chief editor. He destroyed the Fourton-Broglie administration. He overthrew Boulanger. He caused the fall of Jules Grévy, and of Jules Ferry. He wrecked the activities and position of M. Freycinet at least three times.

Yet his own policy was a consistent radical Republicanism, clear and practical; he stood for the realization of all that the revolution had hoped and dreamed. He was opposed, we may note, to the alliance with Russia, determined that his country should not be joined in so close a friendship with a despotic power. He unceasingly upheld the complete separation of Church and State. He urged constantly the development of French resources to the utmost. And those who have watched his career closely point out the growth of the man's political philosophy from his early reckless radicalism to the saner advocacy of a just and free democracy.

But in 1893 he fell. He fell with a completeness that was universally believed to be hopeless. He was disgraced, finished. He was accused of complicity in disloyalties and dishonesties in connection with the Panama Canal scandals. He met every charge against his integrity. The attack on him in the Chamber utterly broke down. But his own constituents turned against him. He was literally put out of politics. For nine years he had no connection with the Government of France.

But two years after his overthrow a very different Clemenceau made his appearance in the world of French letters. The wily politician, the reckless duelist, the insolent hounder of his foes, was gone. In his place was a philosopher and littérateur, a man who wrote exquisite prose, a lover of nature, a friend of humankind. Among his writings during that period were a book on the philosophy of Nature, "Great Pan"; a novel of social life, "The Strongest"; a play of which the scene was laid at the Court of China, and some notable criticisms. But he returned in a few years to journalism. His old paper had gone down in the wreck of its chief's career. But when the Dreyfus affair suddenly burst upon France, a new journal, L'Aurore, edited by M. Clemenceau, made its appearance. It was devoted to the proving of Dreyfus's innocence.

Clemenceau was back in the active world of French affairs with a vengeance. With his tireless defense of Dreyfus, he became, as some one has said, "the sentient conscience of France in print." It was in Clemenceau's paper that Zola published his famous "J'accuse." Month after month Clemenceau wrote articles of which Sydney Brooks states: "They remain, I suppose, the most brilliant masterpieces of polemics that French literature has produced since Pascal's famous 'Provincial Letters.' At the time of their appearance their effect was prodigious. No publicist did more, very few did as much, to guide French opinion through the mazes of that exhausting crisis."

And the political world that Clemenceau thus dramatically re-entered, he has never left. In 1902 the same constituency that had forsaken him in his hour of trial returned him triumphantly to the Senate. In the Spring of 1906 he was appointed to public office for the first time in his life as Minister of the Interior. In November of that year upon the retirement of M. Sarrien, he became Premier.

While he was in office the most important thing that happened was the great miners' strike, which the Socialists organized. Knowing his revolutionary tendencies, the miners expected his sympathy, especially when he went personally to investigate their complaints But with the first outbreak of violence Clemenceau became a ruler of iron. The soldiers were called out and the riots were put down. Clemenceau found himself attacked by the Socialists and involved in a personal controversy with Jaurès. But when he asked the latter whether he, in a position of authority, would have acted differently, the Socialist leader was unable to reply.

In 1909 his old enemy, Delcassé, rose up suddenly and overthrew his Ministry. A discussion over naval affairs sprang up almost overnight. There were scandals, investigations, controversies. In a verbal duel with Delcassé—in the early years of Clemenceau's activity his duels were frequently not verbal—the Premier, to quote a newspaper dispatch, "seemed, for the first time in his Parliamentary career, to lose his head." Certainly he lost his temper, declared that Delcassé had "humiliated France," and stalked out of the room. The President shortly after offered the Premiership to M. Leon Bourgeois.

But Clemenceau's power was not broken. He kept his place in the Senate In 1912 he overthrew Caillaux's Ministry. In 1913 he wrecked Briand's Cabinet on the issue of proportional representation. He started a new paper L'Homme Libre. When the present war began he entered the Viviani Ministry For some time he was Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee on the Army

His patriotism is well known, but he has never hesitated in the midst of the stress of war to argue, criticise, and actually attack where he believed that a need for opposition existed. In September, 1914, he published in his paper—which he had moved to Toulouse—a plea for preferential treatment for German prisoners from Alsace. For this his journal was ordered suspended for eight days. Clemenceau did not stop publication. He changed the name of his paper L'Homme Libre (The Free Man) to L'Homme Enchaîné, (The Man in Chains.) And its editor continued to criticise. The paper has been temporarily suppressed several times.

In April of this year he was outspoken in his censure of the management of the allied offensive. He was somewhat scornful of America's long-continued neutrality, but was enthusiastic in his welcome when the United States entered the war.

The AEOLIAN-VOCALION

PERIOD STYLE 1493
Queen Anne, 1702-1714

IN this design, the Holland influence, a factor in Queen Anne Furniture, is very marked.

The cowed base, whose curve is continued by the characteristic "cabriole" leg, gives this Vocalion a grace very pleasing to those who admire this Period. The finely moulded top, the shaped chamfering of the corners and the decorative grille, all contribute to the harmony of the whole.

WORKING FOR SOLUTION OF AUTO THEFT PROBLEM

Favorable Reception of Secretary Hugo's Suggestion—Locking Device No Bar to Expert Thief.

Secretary of State Hugo said last week that he had received a large number of favorable replies from owners, manufacturers, and dealers to the suggestion which he recently made as a means of curtailing thefts of motor cars, that the manufacturer's number should be affixed on the steering column of the car, in addition to being placed on the motor. One of the replies came from the Secretary of State of Ohio, who said he was anxious to co-operate in any way that would reduce the automobile theft evil. Secretary Hugo intimated that in the near future a conference of representatives from the leading motor organizations would be held to determine some definite plan to present to the manufacturing interests.

Investigation of statistics on motor car thefts compiled by the Police Department revealed the fact that more cars are usually stolen around the first of January than at any other period of the year. One reason is that a large number of cars has generally been sold during the holidays. The cars are new models and of more value than those in use for a year or more. The owner hardly knows it when he sees it from a dozen other cars of the same make. It has no identifying marks. After he has owned it long enough to be in an accident or two, it has its own distinguishing characteristics. It is Winter, and when an owner drives up he lets his engine run, so that all the thief has to do is to step in and help himself. The weather is against possible pursuers, with the result that the thief takes time by the forelock and makes his haul while the year is young.

Many cars are stolen through the medium of the chauffeur—and the chauffeur may be perfectly innocent. He often is. When the habits of a certain car are being watched with a view of unwarranted ownership, the chauffeur makes more friends than at any other time; agreeable fellows who buy him drinks and get him to talk about his employer. When the car is lifted, however, the one who cultivated the chauffeur is not in evidence. Even when wholly innocent chauffeurs may grow careless, many owners are putting in the agreement with the chauffeur a clause that he shall forfeit two weeks' wages if the car disappears while he is in charge.

Before a car is stolen its habits, as they are known in the profession, are watched. The thieves know the routine of the car's life; they know where it goes, when it goes, and for how long it will remain unwatched. If the thieves are to "lift" a car, while the car is waiting in front of a man's office, they do not simply get in and ride away. The car is watched until they know with some degree of accuracy how long it will stand unoccupied, and then when the opportune time comes they avail themselves of the car's wait and speed away over a route previously determined.

No fewer than five persons are usually implicated in the stealing of a car. They are the locater, the grabber, the garage owner, the mechanic, and the fence. The "locater" is the one who picks out the car to be stolen; the "grabber" is the one who drives the car off; the mechanic disguises the car, while the "fence" disposes of the stolen property.

Of the locks designed to prevent theft the commonest is the gasoline lock, but it has certain disadvantages. There are a number of locks for cutting off the fuel supply, one being a combination lock worked on the principle of a Post Office box, to appeal to the man who has the habit of leaving his key in his other clothes. The lock is worked by tumblers which, falling into the pipe line, cut off the fuel. But even this does not keep the thief away, for the thief of today goes prepared for such an emergency. He not only carries a small kit of tools with him, but in addition a bottle. In the bottle is gasoline. He has observed the habits of the car; he knows approximately when the owner will return, and so he does not even have to test the car to see if the fuel lock is on. He knows this car has such a lock and is prepared. With his steel nippers he cuts the fuel line below the lock and with the rubber tubing from his beer bottle feeds gasoline into the carburetor. He is off to a garage, while the owner comes out and puzzles his head how anybody could have moved his car when he simply never let it stand without locking.

The only safeguard is to remove the motor, for without this there is no ignition and motors are not easily duplicated in case the thief wanted to slip in another.

Too much dependence must not be placed on the gasoline lock without preparatory caution on the part of the driver. He must remember that there is enough gasoline in the carburetor to carry his car a block or even two blocks, even though the fuel line is cut off. The thief can thus get the car out of sight and around the corner and there doctor it at will. This objection to a fuel lock may be overcome by shutting off the power a block before the point where the car is to be stopped. If this is forgotten, the driver may keep the engine running until it dies of itself.

Appliances for the steering wheel, the gears, or the brakes that make use of a chain or some mechanical part are only a moment's hindrance to a thief. He has come equipped with pliers for all that.

The commonest lock, and the one that the average inventor turns his ingenuity upon, is a mechanism for locking the wheel. Many of these are home made. These can be nipped by the thief, and especially so if he is working under cover of night, but there is another objection to them that is a bad handicap to the new owner who puts his faith in them. In most cities they are forbidden by the fire laws. This by reason of the fact that if a fire should break out and the fire trucks came clattering up the firemen would not be able to get the chained car out of the way.

In addition, there is another discouraging feature in placing one's faith in a lock. An owner locks his car with a patent device that human ingenuity cannot break and goes into a store for a few minutes. While he is gone a workman in overalls comes down the street in a wrecking car. In his hand is a piece of paper. Backing up to the car, he fastens on a towline, and is just starting off when a policeman comes up and asks him what he is doing. His answer is that he is from a garage and to show the officer the slip of paper bearing the make of the car, its number and location. The man in overalls supplies the power, and the car is off; safely out of sight, an accomplice steps out, unfastens the towline, gets in, and joyously rides away.

Certain factors removed from locks are, however, working to make life happier for the car owner. One is the recommendation of the Society of Automotive Engineers that the location of all engine numbers be standardized, the location being on the crankcase proper, at the front end, as near the middle as possible. Another suggestion is to make the license number and the engine number the same. Another plan, originated in Toledo, is to stamp by chemical process the serial number of the car on the windshield, with the name of the owner and his home address. In case of theft a broken windshield would immediately arouse suspicion.

HEADLIGHT UNIFORMITY.

Automotive Engineers Meet State Representatives to Discuss Measure.

In an effort to obtain uniform State laws regulating automobile headlights, representatives from New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania met with a committee from the Society of Automotive Engineers last week in the Engineers' Building.

Many States have been approving certain makes of anti-glare devices, but these are only effective if the lamp is properly adjusted before the anti-glare device is fitted, which means that placing the stamp of approval on any device is useless.

The restrictions on any headlight to prevent glare require the beam of light not to be higher than 42 inches from the surface of the road. It was admitted that present legislation is not satisfactory, but no definite conclusion was reached as to the correct method of enforcing the 42-inch rule, which all agree is the desired condition to be had with lamps.

Electric Truck Utility.

A large gasoline automobile company has a fleet of forty-nine electric industrial trucks, and in its plant, which covers about 110 acres of floor space, the average hauls are 150 feet. The trucks pull loads up 12 per cent. grades. The cars are housed in an 80 by 80 foot garage. The operating record of a two-ton truck was kept during one month, and the average cost per ton-mile was: Labor, $2.04; power, .066; maintenance, .010; investment and depreciation, .017; average total cost per ton-mile, $2.133.

This truck averaged 3.7 miles per day loaded, plus the same mileage empty, and its average total tonnage was 14.1.

AUTO TRADE NOTES

Harry Stowe of the Mitchell Motor Car Company reports that business conditions are very satisfactory. The automobile business in the West, and particularly in the Southwest, is very good, he says, owing to the fact that the farmers are getting high prices for their products. The same is true in Philadelphia, where the sale of automobiles has shown a big increase during the past few weeks.

Instead of zone managers the United States Motor Truck Company will appoint assistant sales managers, who will have charge of certain States, with headquarters in prominent cities, according to the announcement just made by Forrest J. Alvin, general manager.

The Haynes Automobile Company of Kokomo, Ind., will open a factory branch in Detroit, Mich. It will be in charge of D. L. Wilson, formerly Assistant General Manager of the company.

President Henry Drouet of the L. & D. Motors, Inc., announces the removal of the company's salesrooms from Sixty-third Street and Broadway to 237 West Fifty-eighth Street at Broadway.

The Colt-Stratton Company will open an instruction course for owner of Dodge motor cars at 109 West Sixty-fourth Street tomorrow.

The Sandorf Automobile Company has completed an addition to its salesrooms at 1,763 Broadway.

Two Maxwell cars were recently driven a total of 10,000 miles at an expense of only 50 cents. One Maxwell was driven 4,460 miles without one cent for repairs. The other Maxwell covered 5,088 miles and required repairs amounting to 50 cents.

The Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company of Akron, Ohio, has instituted meatless Tuesdays and wheatless Wednesdays in the company's three restaurants.

Sales reports of the Saxon Motor Car Corporation show a large number of orders for Southern points. Dealers point out that hereafter the South will be a much better retail field. They base their assertion on the belief that one motor car in a community is salesman for several others because it creates an appetite for ownership.

The Marmon Automobile Company of New York, Inc., has moved to its new showrooms at 1,680 Broadway. The former six-story building at 42 West Sixty-second Street will be devoted to service station work.

Reports to Guy O. Simons, President of the Stevens Sales Company of Detroit, Eastern Michigan distributers for Willys-Overland and Willys-Knight cars, state that the company will display no new models at the National Automobile Soows in January.

The Westcott Express Company of New York City, which has 100 Willys-Knight taxicabs in use, has placed an order for fifty additional cars with Willys-Overland, Inc., of Toledo.

LETTERS FROM HOME DELIVERED IN CAMP BY MOTOR TRUCK.

The utility of the motor truck has been shown to great advantage in the construction and transportation service of the large army camps where thousands of young men are being trained for military duty. The above picture shows its use as a mail carrier—bringing fond messages from home to the boys in khaki—thus proving its worth as an antidote for homesickness. This is one of thirty-three White two-ton trucks which had hard service in Mexico and are now at Camp Dodge, Iowa, in command of Captain K. G. Martin of United States Truck Company No. 57. In the transportation tests it was found that an entire company of soldiers could be loaded from the ground with rifles and equipment in fifteen seconds. Experiments have also been made in field manoeuvres and trains of trucks run in sections, each section loaded with men detailed for special duty, such as the laying of signal lines, the placing of explosive charges and the guarding of approaches. In every instance, Captain Martin says, the rapid transportation provided by the trucks proved satisfactory.

ARMY MOTOR BATTERIES.

First Complete Equipment at Fort Sill—Engineers Needed for Service.

The first complete motorized battery has been formed at Fort Sill, Okla., in charge of Captain W. H. Capron. The battery consists of four guns with their limbers and six caissons with their limbers, six ammunition trucks, a store truck and a machine shop or repair truck. In the case of guns of smaller calibre a tractor will haul a section of artillery which consists of a caisson and its limber and a gun and its limber. Each tractor pulls a load of about nine tons. The vehicles used are six trucks, a tractor and a touring car.

The entire brigade as proposed by the War Department will be composed of three regiments, having a maximum strength of 3,685 officers and men. It will have 72 guns and 108 caissons. To keep this equipment working will require 186 ammunition trucks, 27 store trucks, 90 tractors, 9 repair trucks, 21 repair cars, 9 passenger trucks, 9 tank trucks and 37 supply trucks, all motor driven. In addition to these vehicles the brigade has 297 motor cycles with side cars and 30 reel carts.

Men of engineering skill are required for the motor service of the army and applications should be sent to Coker F. Clarkson, Secretary of the Advisory Commission of the Council of National Defense, Washington, D. C.

79,675 Ford Cars in October.

During the month of October the Ford Motor Company made 79,675 cars. In the last six months their production was 469,125, or at the rate of 938,270 per annum. The estimated production for the year was placed at 900,000, about 3,000 per day.

MOTOR CAR NOT HUMAN.

A Fine Piece of Machinery Demanding Care for Efficiency.

"One trouble with the average motor car owner," says the manager of an automobile service company, "is that he fails to realize that the automobile is a piece of very fine machinery, and that it will render service in proportion to the attention it receives. It is not human, and will not cry out when abused.

"When it becomes necessary, through accident, neglect, abuse, or other cause to make a change, one should seek the advice and services of the dealer from whom he has bought the car. This dealer has the interest of the car at heart more than any other person in the trade. But if distance makes the dealer unavailable, it is cheaper in the end to employ the best mechanic."

AUTO CHANGES NEEDED FOR USE IN WINTER

Overhaul the Lubricating System Before Cold Weather—How to Test Oils for Proper Circulation.

By WILLIAM H. STEWART, JR.

Do not neglect to overhaul the lubricating system before Winter is far advanced. It is a job which the ordinary driver avoids because it is dirty. But serious trouble may follow if the work is not done in time. Winter, with its low temperature, brings unusual conditions and the various lubricants used must be adapted to the change.

Doubtless the oil in the crank case has been changed about every 1,500 miles during the Summer, a rule which should be followed all Winter. But frequently the motorist neglects to clean the crank case when changing oils and so the dirt and grit remain in the bottom of the crank case to contaminate the new oil. To avoid this, empty the old oil and fill to the proper level with kerosene. Run the engine under its own power from half to three-quarters of a minute in order to wash down all the old oil and the impurities with it. Then drain thoroughly and fill with fresh lubricant.

Ordinarily the oil base should be removed and the strainer, pump, and pipes thoroughly cleaned. A new gasket should then be fitted. This is more of a job than the average person wishes to undertake, so the kerosene method may be considered fairly satisfactory.

Before installing the new oil consider whether it is adapted to the new season or not. The working temperature may be the same, but the oil sump is exposed to every blast of cold air and the oil may be chilled to a point where it cannot flow. As soon as freezing weather arrives make a cold test of the lubricant as follows: Place half a tumbler of the oil in some place where it may be exposed to the elements. Watch it from day to day. If it thickens and refuses to flow at any time it is hardly suited to your engine. Use a slightly thinner oil or one not too sluggish at low temperatures. If inconvenient to change the oil immediately, garage the car in a warm place and do not take it out until the engine has run several minutes and the oil circulation is insured. The warm oil flowing back into the sump soon brings it to a temperature where the cold will have no bad effect upon it. If obliged to let the car stand any length of time with engine not running, you will of course blanket the radiator, which not only protects the cooling system but the oil as well.

There is one danger which is frequently overlooked, and that is an accumulation of water at the bottom of the sump. This results from the products of combustion leaking past the piston, and also from occasional leakage of the cooling system. If the sump is exposed to freezing temperature this water will freeze. If there is much water some may freeze in the oil pump and wreck it. An occasional inspection is advisable.

Change the grease in the gear case and differential case to a heavy oil. A semi-fluid grease or gear compound will thicken in Winter, and will not penetrate where it should. Both places should be flushed with kerosene and the dirt and grit washed down with a long-handled brush. A heavy oil will thicken slightly, but it will soften quickly in use, and will then flow to the places where it is needed, whereas a grease will be pushed aside and stay there, being useless as a lubricant.

Autoists to Hear Magistrate House.

Magistrate Frederick B. House of the Traffic Court will be the guest of the Motor Truck Club of America at a dinner next Wednesday evening, at the Automobile Club of America. He will speak on traffic conditions in the city.

WOMEN SHOPPERS NOW OBEY NEW RULES FOR WININNG WAR

Return-Goods Evil Greatly Reduced — Working on Delivery and Other Problems for Added Savings.

BECAUSE the abuse of the return-goods privilege added from 5 to 10 per cent. to the cost of doing business and because the entrance of the United States into the war made necessary the conservation of the financial resources of the country, the Commercial Economy Board of the Council of National Defense called upon the stores and the public to co-operate in reducing the waste growing out of returns and other shopping irregularities. This led to the adoption of a rule by almost all of the leading stores and shops of the city which reads: "No goods will be received for credit or exchange that are not offered to us within seven days from receipt. This rule does not apply to merchandise that is sold on a strictly non-returnable basis for sanitary or other reasons."

The rule has now been in force close to four months. What has been its effect?

H. A. Saks, President of the Retail Dry Goods Association, which includes in its membership practically all of the city's department stores and specialty shops, said when asked this question: "The New York shopping public has co-operated splendidly with the stores in their endeavor to eliminate the return-goods evil. There has been a noticeable decrease in the percentage of needless returns. The public, as a whole, has shopped more carefully and has assisted the merchants in their endeavor to do away with the waste caused by returns of this kind.

"Not only has the seven-day rule decreased the number of returns, but it has resulted in having the legitimate return made more promptly. The number of customers that have objected to the rule are so few as to be practically unnoticeable, and we believe that, through the co-operation of the public, we have achieved, with a rule much less stringent than those that have been adopted in other cities, a result which compares favorably with that attained in any other community."

In relation to the rules adopted in other cities, as mentioned by Mr. Saks, it may be said that they not only are more stringent than the one adopted here, but are more severe in the West and Middle West than in the East. In some Western communities the period of grace given shoppers ranges from twenty-four to forty-eight hours, while in several Eastern cities the average time limit on returns is from two to three days.

Closely allied to the elimination of the return-goods evil in the campaign of the Commercial Economy Board of the Council of National Defense is that of deliveries. Not only does the board in its latest appeal point out the need and wisdom of a restricted delivery service, in order to do away with the necessity for the stores' replacing men in the delivery departments who have entered the national service, but it requests the elimination of special deliveries.

Much of the ability of the stores to meet the board's request for fewer deliveries depends upon the willingness of the shopping public, which really means the women of the country, to carry home small packages. Here in New York the public has taken the "carry-small-packages" movement very well, but there is still plenty of room for improvement in this respect. Particularly is this true in the case of women who patronize the stores and shops which specialize in the higher-priced merchandise. This is what one well-posted department store executive has to say on the general question of carried parcels:

"A great many men from large New York stores have entered the Government service, and the fact that the public has aided greatly by carrying small parcels has made it unnecessary for the stores to replace all of these men. Some of the stores, in fact, have been able to cut down the number of deliveries in certain sections of the city, and there is every reason to believe that, in the coming Christmas season, they will not be compelled to add nearly as many men to their delivery departments as they have been forced to add in the past.

"The elimination of special deliveries is another of the problems that the stores have asked the public to help them solve. There are, of course, times when a special delivery is both legitimate and necessary, but many customers in the past have thoughtlessly requested special delivery of a parcel by 3 o'clock, for example, when as a matter of fact it would have served their needs just as well to have had it in their possession by 4 or 5 o'clock—that is, by a regular delivery. Requests of this kind, while of comparatively little importance in normal times, have become a vital factor at this time, when the war makes it necessary that the work of every man or woman shall produce something."

To show the inconvenience and expense that the stores are sometimes put to by requests for special deliveries, another executive cited the case of a woman who wanted to work on a garment and found she needed a certain kind of button. Instead of putting the job off until another day, getting the button in the meantime, she called up her favorite store and asked them to send her one as quickly as possible. She was a good customer, and although the button retailed at only 3 cents, the store delivered it as requested. To do so not only made unprofitable the time of the messenger sent, but added to the store's loss the car fare required by him to make the delivery.

Another factor in the delivery problem that has proved expensive to stores in the past, and in the handling of which the public by co-operation can effect a decided saving, is sending goods C. O. D. It is the practice of many stores to make three trips with such goods before the sale is given up for lost, the expense of which eats sharply into the profits on the sale if the delivery man is lucky enough finally to catch the customer at home. Even when customers are found at home, store statistics show that one out of every three or four C. O. D. packages is refused or later returned.

One thing that has not yet been mentioned by the Commercial Economy Board, but which is of vital importance both to the stores and the public in that it would help keep retail prices down in the face of the rapid rise of all kinds of merchandise at wholesale, is more shopping in the morning.

Reverting to the return-goods evil. Not all of the objection to illegitimate returning is based on the time the merchandise is out of the store, as is shown by this instance: A woman brought to a certain local store a set of expensive sterling silver tableware, consisting of thirty-six pieces. She contended that the store had spoiled the set by engraving the pieces with the letter C, when they should have been marked with a G. She wanted credit for the set, and, as the investigation of the case promised to take some time, she was asked to call later. A careful search of the department's sales records brought to light no mention of the sale or order for engraving, so when the woman returned, credit was refused. She left the store quietly enough, though obviously disappointed, but returned a few weeks later with another woman, and again asked for credit on the set, threatening suit if redress were not given for the alleged error. Again her request was refused, and she gathered up the silver and left the department. But this time she paused long enough to remark that she had not bought the set there, anyway.

Piece goods sold by the yard, especially silks and woolens, are a frequent source of returns. These goods are made into garments by the purchasers or by dressmakers employed by them, and generally come back to the store in the madeup state with the complaint that they "pull" in the seams and are otherwise defective. Whether it is the fault of the goods or not—and it is said that generally it is not—credit or exchange is demanded.

The return-goods evil is not without its bad aspect from other viewpoints than the purely financial. This is given as an illustration: A big store here sold a pair of earrings to a customer. This store has a rule that earrings cannot be returned for sanitary reasons, along with other merchandise of an "intimate" nature. The earrings in this case cost $1.49, yet the woman who bought them was perfectly willing to tell an untruth in order to recover this small sum. She tried to return the earrings, and failing, requested the store a few days later to call for some shirt studs that she wanted to return. Under the guise of studs the earrings were brought back to the store. The truth was discovered, and when the customer called later and demanded credit for them her request was refused. There are dozens of instances stored up in the memories of buyers and store executives which prove the point in question. Some women who would never dream of telling an untruth under other circumstances feel perfectly free to deny wearing a hat or a dress that they have purchased, and later returned as unsatisfactory, in spite of pin holes and other visible signs to the contrary.

How many women have returned goods with a clear conscience, after having wasted an hour of a clerk's time, in the belief that they have helped the clerk by giving him or her a salary. Nothing is more wrong than this belief. All up-to-date stores have a system of remunerating clerks that requires a careful check on the sales of each, and when merchandise is returned the amount of the sale is deducted from the total sales of the clerk. Thus it is evident that the sale which is not a sale, because the goods come back, hurts instead of benefits the clerk.

Clear the Way

Help Our Army, Navy and Allies to Win This War

AMERICA'S RAILROADS are doing wonderful work, but they need help.

Freight cars must be unloaded and terminals cleared.

If it is your job, speed up loading and unloading of cars on private sidings.

Do not be a slacker by trying to save expense of labor or space by using freight cars as storage houses.

If your merchandise is congested at the terminals and you have not sufficient teams or motor trucks to move the goods at once, buy them or hire public ones.

If you can't do this, do something else—ask your neighbor to help you. Why hesitate to hire your neighbors' trucking facilities?

OFFICERS EXECUTIVES MANAGERS

We must pull together.

Shipping Departments throughout the country demand the personal consideration of executives.

Co-operation throughout the entire establishment with the Shipping Department is vital.

A certain all the old rules and regulations your Shipping Department is expected to carry out, and if they do not fit the present emergency, throw them away.

Plan to reach nearby points by motor trucks, teams or waterways—save the railroad terminals. Twenty-five per cent (25%) of case, barrel and package merchandise can be delivered in this way, and help break the congestion. No one wants embargoes.

EXCLUSIVE GOVERNMENT TERMINALS

If the railroads decide to reserve certain terminals exclusively for Government materials, do not grumble, but go the extra distance and haul your goods to or from other terminals.

It may be necessary to have a National Terminal Clearing Day in order to clear all terminals throughout the entire country.

NATIONAL TERMINAL CLEARING DAY

If we have a Terminal Clearing Day, keep your teams and motor trucks going and keep your receiving departments open continuously 24 or 48 hours, if need be, and give the railroads a chance to catch up.

Let everybody be prepared some way, somehow, to move their merchandise away from the terminals immediately.

WAR-TIME CATTLE SHOW PROVED BREEDERS' PATRIOTISM

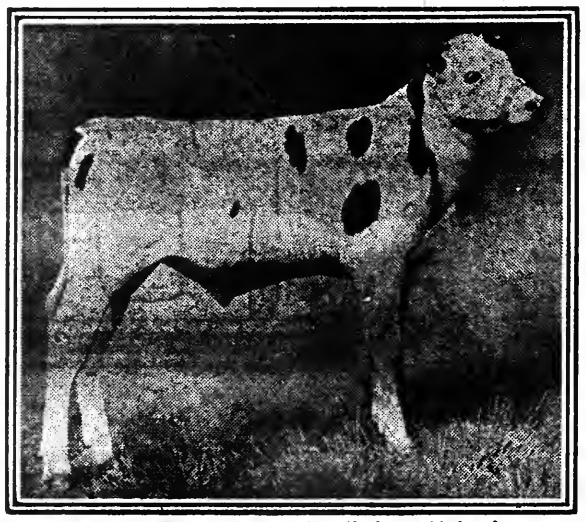
An Exhibition of the Sinews of War in Terms of Food and Power—Animals Worth Many Thousands of Dollars Each Shown at Columbus, Ohio.

WITH much interest throughout the country centred on the importance of the dairy industry, the eleventh annual National Dairy Show, held recently at Columbus, Ohio, attracted particular attention. The 1,000 head of the bluest of blue-blooded animals competing in the ring drew not only the breeders of the best dairy animals in the land, but had, as well, the support and the attention of the Department of Agriculture, the Food Administrator, and all the divisions of Government concerned with the conservation of food.

In addition, there were gathered at Columbus for the Horse Fair, held in connection with the show, one of the most notable collections of heavy draft stallions and mares ever brought together. Therefore, although the exhibition went under the somewhat peaceful title of a dairy show, it was distinctly an exhibition of the sinews of war expressed in the terms of food and of power. This note was struck time and again during the week. One could not attend the exhibition without realizing that breeders of pure-bred and high-producing cattle were concerned in a patriotic effort no less sincere and far reaching, no less essential to the welfare of the country during the progress of the war, than the growers of wheat or the makers of munitions.

Cattle were in the big barns and in the show ring from no less than twenty-three States, as widely separated as Vermont and California. One enthusiastic breeder of Guernseys made an outlay of $7,000 in order to have a string of animals from his farm appear before the judge's eye. A Jersey bull was in the ring, the sire of which had brought the long price of $25,000, and there were animals of some of the other dairy breeds—Holsteins, Ayrshires, and Brown Swiss—the values of which also went into five figures. The aggregate value of the cattle alone—leaving out of account the horses altogether—was probably more than $1,500,000.

In the class for Jersey bulls more than three years of age, thirteen animals were entered, and their quality was so uniformly good and their type so much alike that it required forty-five minutes for the judge, Professor H. H. Kildee of the University of Minnesota, to decide the six places of honor. The closest struggle, of course, was for first place and the decision hung in the balance between Gamboge's Vellum Majesty, owned by M. D. Munn of St. Paul, Minn., and Noble Sultan's Golden Fern, owned by Mrs. Harry H. Galbraith of Knoxville, Tenn. Both owners were watching eagerly by the ringside while the judge made his choice. When the victory finally went to Mr. Munn's splendid bull both owners rushed into the ring and embraced their respective animals.



King Ormsby Jane Rag Apple, a bull calf that sold for $53,200 at the age of 9 months, in Worcester, Mass.

When the unusually fine class of mature Holstein bulls entered the ring—ten black and white monsters that looked almost as big as elephants—several thousand spectators broke into applause, moved irresistibly, it seemed, by the majesty of the spectacle. The calf herds brought forth many sounds of delight from the feminine portion of the spectators and on the horse side of the ring there was a constant atmosphere of excitement as the big drafters went through their paces to the accompaniment of the snapping of whips and the cries of the stud grooms.

The championships for cows of the four leading breeds went to the Jersey, Oxford Majesty's Gipsy, owned by L. V. Walkley of Southington, Conn.; the Guernsey, Imported Princess Bergere, owned by W. W. Marsh of Waterloo, Iowa; the Holstein, Minerva Beets, owned by R. E. Hager of Algonquin, Ill., and the Ayrshire, Shewalton Mains Queen, owned by Hugh J. Chisholm of Port Chester, N. Y. In the bulls the premier honors were divided among M. D. Munn with the Jersey, Gamboge's Vellum Majesty; D. D. Tenney of Crystal Bay, Minn., with the Guernsey, Ladysmith's Cherub; Iowana Farms of Davenport, Iowa, with the Holstein, Oak DeKol Ollie Homestead, and Adam Seitz of Waukesha, Wis., with the Ayrshire, Cavalier's Lord Rose.

Fortunately for the chronicler of winnings, the honors did not always go to the animal bearing the longest name. One bull on exhibition bore the handy little title of Bargenoch Gay Cavalier's Rising Star of Spring City.

Not the least important parts of the exhibition were the Government demonstration herds. A central pavilion in one of the large buildings that comprise the State Fair Grounds at Columbus was set aside for this exhibit. It included a herd of mixed breeding and two generations, with the production records in milk and butter fat of each animal set forth on a chart above her head. It was thus graphically exemplified how the production—to the benefit of their owner as well as of the country at large—had increased in the daughters of the foundation cows by the introduction into the herd of a pure-bred sire.

Remarkable results have been obtained from this process of "grading up." For example, in a scrub herd at the Iowa Experiment Station the average production of a group of scrub cows was 3,255 pounds of milk, containing 161 pounds of butter fat, in a year. The daughters of these cows, sired by a pure-bred bull of good ancestry, averaged 6,211 pounds of milk and 261 pounds of fat in a year. Their daughters in turn, resulting from matings with approved bulls of the same breed, averaged 11,295 pounds of milk and 431 pounds of fat in a year. In other words, with this particular group of cows, the result of judicious matings was an increase of 94 per cent. in milk and 62 per cent. in fat in the first generation and of 245 per cent. in milk and 168 per cent. in fat in the second generation. The argument in favor of the use of pure-bred sires would hardly require any amplification after such a result.

In the Government exhibit at the Dairy Show was also a herd of some ten cows of various breeding and degrees of pureness of blood. They were on exhibition in stanchions, just as they might have been in an average modern dairy barn. The public was invited to look them over and act as amateur cattle judges, picking out the best cow from the lot. This judgment was confirmed or altered by the experts in charge of the exhibition in the course of the several daily lectures, which were held as part of the Government demonstration. This free-for-all contest in sizing up the merits of a cow appealed to a large number of practical farmers and breeders who were in attendance, as well as to the ever-present multitude which attends a dairy show simply because it likes animals. Both types of visitors showed no hesitation about making a choice. That particular section of the barns was always the magnet for an interested crowd.

But the Government's participation did not stop with its own exhibit. Its voice, through a number of representatives of the Department of Agriculture, was heard at the meetings of the various breed associations held during the week.

The Chief of the Dairy Division of the Department—B. H. Rawe—had charge of one of the most interesting and important educational elements of the show. This was the students' judging contest. The first contest of this nature was held in Chicago in 1906, and the succeeding contests have been marked annually by an increase in the number of entries and a growing interest in the competition. In 1916 there were eighteen teams from the various agricultural colleges in competition, and this year the number was still larger. The contest has been each year a subject of increasing interest in the colleges. In one instance a college did not make much of dairying, but it succeeded in putting a good team in the field and carried off the prize for Jersey judging. This so roused the enthusiasm of the boys in the home State that the next season the number of students in the dairy department of that college was quadrupled.

Substantial prizes are offered annually for the judging contests. Three purses of $400 each are given to be used as scholarships, so that the winning dairy student can continue after graduation and take post-graduate work. In addition, cups and medals are awarded by the National Dairy Show Association and by the various breed associations. The men who offer these prizes and the men who give their efforts to conducting the contests have in mind the improvement of the whole dairy industry which will follow upon more widespread education in teaching, official work, extension, breeding, and business. They feel that dairy leaders must be highly trained and that there must be more of them. The colleges are doing all that they can to meet the need, but up to the present the number of men graduated in dairying in agricultural colleges has been comparatively small.

Among the colleges represented in this year's contest were Delaware Agricultural College, Newark, Del.; Iowa State College, Ames, Iowa; Kansas State Agricultural College, Manhattan, Kan.; Kentucky State University, Lexington, Ky.; Massachusetts Agricultural College, Amherst, Mass.; Maryland State College of Agriculture, College Park, Md.; New Jersey Agricultural College, New Brunswick, N. J.; Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio; Pennsylvania State College, State College, Penn.; South Dakota State College and Experiment Station, Brookings, S. D.; University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo.; University of Nebraska, Lincoln, Neb.; Virginia Polytechnic Institute, Blacksburg, Va.

The sweepstakes contest was won by Missouri College team; M. N. Swett, coach; M. R. Dunn, O. Z. Schaefer, and F. W. Atkenson.

The patriotic issue, frequently raised, found ready response at this year's show. It was made clear that the dairymen of the country, the men back on the farms producing so valuable and so important a part of the world's supply of food, proposed to do their war-time bit. They are not making a lot of noise about it, but they are prepared to meet the stress and strain of rising costs of feed and of labor and of the perplexing problem of marketing at a price not too exacting on the ultimate consumer. And they are one in the conviction of the necessity of both the conservation and the spread of the pure-bred and productive type of cattle to the lasting good of the country in both war and peace.

NEW YORK'S POLICE BAND

PREPAREDNESS for any musical emergency, be it great or small, is the aim of Father Knickerbocker's Police Band. This body of blue-coated musicians is not a haphazard venture or a passing fad. The band has been in existence some fifteen years. Those who witnessed the recent police parade will remember the burnished instruments and spotless uniforms.

It was approximately fifteen years ago that a handful of policemen, with the approval of Commissioner Murphy, then in command of the department, conceived the idea of a police band. They were spurred on by the success of the Letter Carriers' Band and the Fire Department Band, and of police bands in other cities.

But to found a band and to keep it in running order were two different things. The first few months were anything but comfortable. Sneered at from without the department and joked about within, the founders had hard sledding.

For years the band has appeared at the Annual Memorial Military Field Mass for dead veterans of the civil and Spanish-American wars held at the New York Navy Yard in Brooklyn on Memorial Sunday. It is in great demand at police and other memorial services in New York and nearby cities. It appears very often for the benefit of charitable projects and has given many concerts. As a memento of their appreciation, members of the Philadelphia police force two years ago presented an engraved silver loving cup to the New York Police Band for having made a flying trip to the Quaker City to give a concert in aid of the Philadelphia Police Pension Fund.

Sergeant Floyd B. Pitts, attached to Detective Bureau at Headquarters, is the band's President. Sergeant Pitts was one of the organizers of the band and knows the capabilities and limitations of each of the eighty-odd members.

The ROAMER
America's Smartest Car

TO see a ROAMER is to desire to own it; to drive this vibrationless thing of power is to be convinced that here, at last, is beauty wedded to mechanical worth. Quite apart in appearance from any motor car made in America, the ROAMER instills a joy of ownership no ordinary "Automobile" could possibly engender.

There are a great many excellent people who are content with automobiles of mediocre design, rococo furniture, and mid-Victorian architecture and then there are the comparative few who discriminate wisely and well. It is for these latter that we build the ROAMER with painstaking care. It is for these we finish each ROAMER in a different color scheme according to the preference of the purchaser and without additional cost, and it is these who finally buy this undying, indomitable creature of speed and stamina.

Automobiles Keep Men and Merchandise Moving

Railroads are strained to their limit today to supply transportation for man and merchandise.

The automobile has stepped into the breach, and is the second greatest factor in meeting the national need for more—more—more transportation.

You must keep your car fulfilling its part of the need,

—keep it ready day or night to do its part in your transportation service,

—keep its "feet" well shod,

—give it the tires that have stood, and are continuing to stand, the test of mileage,

—the tires that give low mileage cost and high anti-skid service.

Put United States 'Royal Cord' Tires on your car—make comparisons for yourself.

"Use your car, passenger or commercial, more and more to relieve the transportation pressure on the Nation's railroads and merchants' delivery service."

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS LONG RESTRICTED BY THE POPES

Benedict XV.'s Letter on the Subject Recalls Famous Bull Issned by Alexander VI. Following Colombus's Discovery.

By CHARLES JOHNSTON.

IN his Letter to the Leaders of the Belligerent Peoples, Pope Benedict XV. speaks of "the true liberty and community of the seas," as one of the terms of a last peace. It is of much historic interest that the last great restriction of "the freedom of the seas" was caused by one of Pope Benedict's predecessors, that famous Cardinal Rodrigo Borgia who, in 1492, was raised to the Chair of St. Peter as Pope Alexander VI. A part of the story is very familiar to us; it is told in all our school histories, but, curiously enough, the sequel of the tale, which shaped the world's history for generations, even for centuries, is almost always omitted.

Columbus, as we all remember, sailed from Palos and, in the fullness of time, after passing through many terrors, landed at Watling Island in the Bahamas on Oct. 12, 1492. Thereafter, he coasted along northern and eastern Cuba; passed from Cuba to Hisiti, both islands still bearing the names which he learned from their inhabitants; and, by way of the island now called Porto Rico, he made his way back, our popular histories tell us, to Palos, announced his discoveries to Queen Isabella, and was honored and acclaimed.

But that is not what really happened. That abbreviated account omits the kernel of the story, the key to volumes of future history. In reality, Columbus did not return directly to Palos. A storm drove him out of his course, into the wide estuary of the great Portuguese River Tagus, and the news of his new world was instantly carried to the King of Portugal, who was filled with wrath at being forestalled by Spain, and was ready to claim for Portugal all of the new lands that Columbus had discovered. This was on March 10, 1493; and only on March 15 did Columbus reach Palos, whence he sent word posthaste to Queen Isabella, not only that he had discovered "the Indies," but that the King of Portugal was preparing to claim the said Indies for himself. As an immediate result, the Spanish monarchs sent a hurried deputation to that great Spaniard, Rodrigo Borgia, who now reigned at Rome as Alexander VI. And, as a further result, Pope Alexander VI. issued, on May 4, 1493, just seven weeks after Columbus cast anchor in the harbor of Palos, the famous bull dividing the world between Spain and Portugal, whose significant passages we shall presently give in English.

Portugal had very strong claims. For three quarters of a century, under the splendid inspiration of that man of genius, Prince Henry the Navigator, Portuguese Captains had been trying to solve the problem of a sea route to India to circumvent the Turkish conquerors who had captured and monopolized the old route across the Isthmus of Suez. India was well known, and had been many times visited in the preceding hundred years, and much was known, from the Arab explorers and geographers, concerning the eastern, the further coast of Africa. Marco Polo, on his return by sea from the splendid court of Kublai Khan, had heard of Madagascar, and had fairly well described it. And something was known, through the Moors and their caravan trade, of Western Africa. The question was, What lay between? whether the Dark Continent stretched down to the antarctic pole, or whether there might be a way round, to the south. That was the question which Prince Henry the Navigator, in his observatory on Cape St Vincent, set himself to solve, and which, by virtue of his splendid efforts, his large improvements in the building of ocean-going ships, his skill in mapmaking, was solved triumphantly a few years after his death.

An Englishman, Robert Machin, had discovered Madeira as early as 1370; the Canaries were discovered in 1402 by John de Bethencourt. Prince Henry's Captains, beginning where these two had left off, pushed forward southward and westward, lifting the clouds from the Sea of Darkness, visiting the Azores and Cape Verde Islands, poking their prows around dark Africa till they had surveyed the whole western coast. Fernando Po penetrated into the depths of the Gulf of Guinea, known by the reports of the Moor caravans, and found the island which still bears his name. In a river on the mainland his men found crayfish, and, from the Portuguese name for those succulent crustaceans, named the place Camerones. Diaz, another intrepid Portuguese, had reached the Cape of Tempests in 1486; it was renamed Cape of Good Hope because it promised to reveal the long-sought route to India. And India was, in fact, reached twelve years later by Vasco da Gama, who sailed from Lisbon, reached Calicut in 1498, and then returned safe and triumphant to Lisbon.

The tremendous problem had been to find a sea path to India. It was Portugal that solved it. Spain, through her representative, Christopher Columbus, missed it by half the world. But, by the hugeness of his error, he made a discovery which had also its significance.

The Portuguese discoveries had been ratified by a series of Papal bulls, which had granted to the Kings of Portugal, in somewhat vague terms, lands discovered, or to be discovered, "to the south and west." Therefore, when Columbus, on his return from Cuba and Haiti, in early March, 1493, was blown into the Tagus estuary, Portugal had pretty strong claims and was prepared to push them. So Columbus had good reason to speed back to Palos within the week and Ferdinand and Isabella had excellent justification for sending a statement of their case, without a moment's delay, to their potent fellow-countryman enthroned at Rome. The news reached the Eternal City on April 11. On May 4 the great bull was issued which changed the history of the world. Its most vital passages follow:

"And in order that you may undertake more freely and boldly the charge of so great an affair, given to you with the liberality of apostolic grace, We, of our own motion, and not as your solicitation, nor upon petition presented to us, upon this subject by other persons in your name, but of Our pure free will and certain knowledge, by the authority of God omnipotent granted to us through blessed Peter, and of the vicarship of Jesus Christ, which we exercise upon earth, by the tenor of these presents given, concede and assign for ever to you, and to the Kings of Castile and Leon, your successors, all the islands and main lands discovered and which may hereafter be discovered, towards the west and south, with all their dominions, cities, castles, palaces, and towns, and with all their rights, jurisdictions, and appurtenances, whether the lands and islands found or that shall be found, be situated toward India, or towards any other part whatsoever; and we make, constitute, and depute you, and your aforesaid heirs and successors, lords of them, with full, free, and absolute power and authority and jurisdiction; drawing, however, and fixing a line from the arctic pole, that is, from the north, to the antarctic pole, that is, to the south, which line must be distant from any one of the islands whatsoever commonly called the Azores, and Cape Verde Islands, a hundred leagues toward the west and south; upon condition that no other Christian King or Prince has actual possession of any of the islands and main lands found, or that shall be found, discovered, or that shall be discovered, from the aforesaid line towards the west and south, until the day of the Nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ last past, from which the present year, one thousand four hundred and ninety-three begins, when some of the aforesaid islands were discovered by your messengers and Captains; decreeing nevertheless that by this our donation, concession, and assignment, it is not intended to take or deprive of the right of discovery any other Christian Prince who may have actually possessed the said islands and mainlands up to the aforementioned day of the Nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ. • • •

By an agreement entered into in the following year between the rulers of Portugal and Spain, embodied in a treaty signed at Tordesillas on June 7, 1494, this act was slightly modified; the fixed line, instead of being drawn from pole to pole at a distance of one hundred leagues west of the Azores, was drawn 370 leagues off the Cape Verde Islands, which lie some six degrees to the east of the Azores. This line lay between 45 and 46 degrees of west longitude, and completely encircled the globe, as we shall presently see. The line thus modified is marked on maps of the period, with the flag of Spain to the west of it, the flag of Portugal to the east. It was construed literally as running from the north pole to the south: thus the Portuguese Cantino map of 1502 shows the regions north of the St. Lawrence as Portuguese. The Spanish Ribeiro map of 1527 shows Labrador, so named on that map, as belonging to the King of Portugal. This is quite logical, since the discoveries of the Cabots and their successors in that region, having been made subsequent to Christmas, 1492, were held to be null and void.

The Cantino Map (1502) shows the line of demarcation cutting the north coast of Brazil, which was so named, it would seem, because it was identified with Hy-Brasil, the western paradise supposed to have been discovered by St. Brendan, the ancient Irish navigator. The position of the line on the Cantino map seems to strike the mouth of the Amazon, which is really some four degrees west of the forty-sixth degree of west longitude, but in those days longitudes, being computed by dead reckoning, were somewhat vague. Not till a good many years after did chronometers come into use for their computation. But, as a result of the line of demarcation, Brazil fell to Portugal. It remained a Portuguese colony until the time of the Napoleonic wars, which gave the Latin colonies an opportunity to strike the decisive blow for their independence; as a result of the line of demarcation, Brazil is Portuguese in speech and in tradition today.

The rest of the New World, assigned to Spain by Pope Alexander, soon came to be known as New Spain; and the Spanish conquerors proceeded to carry out the policy of absolute subjugation, so clearly set forth in the papal decree.
